Each person committed to prison, jail, house of correction, or reformatory is a double charge upon society. His productive force is canceled and his earning power blotted from the sum total of human effort. The Nation's balance in industry is reduced by the removal of workers from their looms, machines, engines, tools. These prisoners had economic value. It may have been slight in each individual, but multiply the individual by the grand total of commitments to our penal and correctional institutions in the days of licensed saloons and this drain upon the industrial and productive power of the Nation is tremendous. Behind bars and walls these prisoners are not only nonproductive, they become a charge upon society. The average per capita cost of prisoners is generally in excess of the earning power of these same prisoners when free. Our crime ratio had been increasing through the wet years. It was growing more rapidly than the population increase throughout the country. We were building prisons and jails and workhouses as well as enlarging those already in use but overcrowding was common. To-day in many States there are jails entirely unoccupied, many more with only a small fraction of their former population. We have removed from the red-ink side of our industrial ledger a liability to industry and the public wealth and a growing factor in taxes to the income and productive side of that same ledger.

INDUSTRIAL EFFICIENCY.

Another leak in our resources-not so large as that caused by our imprisonment of those who might be productive elements in our national life but none the less a leak of considerable dimensions—was closed with the saloon doors; the lowered efficiency of the worker on Monday and Tuesday, following the visit on Saturday and, too frequently, on Sunday also to the corner saloon. We have eliminated also the most fruitful source of industrial accidents, the drunken or drink-sodden worker who places his own or his fellow's life or limb in Concrete evidence upon this is furnished by the United Pocahontas Coal Co., who state that-

Our mines are in West Virginia, and we have had prohibition there for about five years. We have had better service from the men than ever before, and, better than anything else, the accidents have been only about one-third as many. And when you think that the deaths by accident are but one out of three to what we had before prohibition, it seems to me that anyone who loves his fellow men will favor the cause of prohibition.

The president of the Gulf States Steel Co. has written ("The Prohibition Question," Manufacturers Record Publishing Co., 1922) that accidents in the plants of that company have been reduced since prohibition went into effect by at least 75 per cent.

The industrial folly of drink, including beer, was long ago urged by a great apostle of efficiency and thrift and his views are now widely accepted. Two centuries ago a young American was engaged as a printer with Watts in London, and in his autobiography written for his son appears this pioneer body blow for "beer and wine," from Franklin:

body blow for "beer and wine," from Franklin:

At my first admission into this printing house I took to working at press, imagining I felt a want of the bodily exercise I had been used to in America, where presswork is mixed with composing. I drank only water; the other workmen, nearly 50 in number, were great guzzlers of beer. On occasion, I carried up and down stairs a large form of types in each hand, when others carried but one in both hands. They wondered to see, from this and several instances, that the "water American," as they called me, was stronger than themselves, who drank strong beer. We had an alchouse boy who attended always in the house to supply the workmen. My companion at the press drank every day a pint before breakfast, a pint at breakfast with his bread and cheese, a pint between breakfast and dinner, a pint at dinner, a pint in the afternoon about 6 o'clock, and another when he had done his day's work. I thought it a detestable custom; but it was necessary, he supposed, to drink strong beer that he might be strong to labor. I endeavored to convince him that the bodily strength afforded by beer could only be in proportion to the grain or flour of the barley dissolved in the water of which it was made: that there was more flour in a pennyworth of bread; and, therefore, if he would eat that with a pint of water it would give him more strength than a quart of beer. He drank on, however, and had 4 or 5 shillings to pay out of his wages every Saturday night for that muddling liquor; an expense I was free from. And thus these poor devils keep themselves always under.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS.

We have passed through one of the most dangerous periods of adjustment after a war and after a period of boom prices without disaster, in large part, because the saloon was not open to drain the national wealth through its sewer. In the last fiscal year alone we have added in the United States to our bank deposits $2,117,423,000. The Michigan State commissioner of banking shows in his reports the following striking figures:

	Number of depositors.	Amount of deposits.	Average to each depositor.
1921	2, 543, 107	1, 084, 187, 417, 88	589. 88

We have increased the amount of insurance in force in 1922 over the last wet year in the States named by these per-centages: Colorado, 172 per cent; Connecticut, 47 per cent; Delaware, 51 per cent; Michigan, 84 per cent; Minnesota, 35 per cent. These are the only States whose 1922 reports have been received as yet. Add to the immense sums received by the insurance companies in premiums during the past dry period, the millions that remained in their treasuries available for use in promoting legitimate enterprises, because a falling death rate cut 500,000 from the death roll of the three dry years, and it will not be difficult to understand why America was the only great Nation to reduce its war debt during the past year. We had the money invested constructively, rather than spent destructively in drink.

In New Jersey resources of State and savings banks, trust companies, and building and loan associations have increased 216 per cent in the three years of prohibition as compared with the last three wet years.

Prohibition has stimulated a nation-wide spirit of thrift, according to statements of prominent Chicago bankers recently received. Savings accounts have been steadily increasing in size and in number ever since the enactment of the Volstead Act, according to the bankers, who attribute the increase in a large measure to the dry law. "Bank deposits have steadily increased ever since prohibition became the law of the land," declared James B. Forgan, chairman of the board of the First National Bank of Chicago. "The absence of the saloons is largely responsible for this growth," he said. John J. Abbott, of the Continental and Commercial Bank, declared the savings in this bank alone had increased 30 per cent since prohibition, and that he believed the increase had been general throughout the country.

The economic importance of prohibition in its broadest phase was emphasized by Sir George Paish, the noted British economist, in a statement in the New Times, October 25, 1922, in

part as follows:

Prohibition is an economic question. There are two reasons for this. First, we must admit that the working classes will command, from now on, a greater share of the world's goods than they have been getting before. Secondly, the difficulty of securing capital from the classes that formerly supplied capital will be exceedingly difficult because of taxes and fear of the future. Therefore unless the working people make savings and provide capital, world business will be at a standstill. They can only make savings by denying themselves pleasures, which include drink. In England to-day they spend from $400,000,000 to $500,000,000 on drink. If half that amount were saved in England and elsewhere among the nations, the problems of the world would be solved. As an economist I consider prohibition is necessary and inevitable.

He added that if the eighteenth amendment proved successful here, Great Britain would have prohibition in a few years. He said that if such a law were passed in England it would be obeyed, as the British stand for law above everything.

Even from New York City, the great prohibition skeptic, comes most surprised testimony of economic benefits. In the Real Estate Record and Builders Guide of New York for November 8, 1922, we find Wm. D. Kilpatrick, one of the best known real estate experts of the metropolis, writes:

The immense material benefits flowing out of the results of State or local prohibition elsewhere in the United States, which advantages undoubtedly helped to bring about national prohibition, were seemingly unknown in New York, and the big outstanding results of the closing of the New York saloons on Sundays only by Theodore Roosevelt, of revered memory, as police commissioner, were apparently forgotten.

The obvious is frequently provided to the results of the closing of the New York saloons on Sundays only by Theodore Roosevelt, or revered memory, as police commissioner, were apparently forgotten.

closing of the New York saloons on Sundays only by Theodore Roosevelt, of revered memory, as police commissioner, were apparently forgotten.

The obvious is frequently overlooked, and certainly nothing was more obvious than the fact that, if the sale of liquor were stopped, a goodly portion of the $700,000,000 spent annually in New York for liquid refreshments would find its way into other and more useful channels. * * * Large gobs of dense realty gloom surrounded the advent of prohibition. Even such an ordinarily astute far-seeing body as the Real Estate Board of New York virtually joined in the lamentations of dire disaster.

Perhaps it is as well that the realty prophecies anent the effects of prohibition were painted in such somber, funereal tints, for the actual, tangible results of prohibition have been so startlingly salutary and profitable to real estate that the inspired character of the antiprohibition realty prediction has been clearly revealed.

Prohibition is here, and although it is anything but honestly enforced, its benefits to realty have been enormous. In the increased rents of retail stores in every part of the city it is worth untold millions to property owners. The money which formerly found its way will as luxuries. Former saloons renting for $1,800 are now renting for $4,800 for other lines, and $40 stores are producing $125. Despite these higher rents, retail dealers are at last making profits which put then in the reality purchasing class. They are buying on all the avenues for occupancy, and likewise for investment.

The big depression following the wild days of 1919 and 1920 was certainly not reflected in the retail store situation. The benefits of prohibition to the wholesale merchant, jobber, and manufacturer were reflected in the rentability of lofts, warehouses, and factories. Other lines of business, professions and trades, transportation, etc., were likewise indirectly benefited. The change in the collection of tenement rents, in spite of the rent laws (the vicious effects of wh quent mortgage money can not be determined, but certainly it was a most important factor.

Any change in the prohibition law, except more drastic enforcement, would be a body blow to the prosperity of New York real estate and to the assessed valuation. When New York can go through a serious business depression following a period of wild inflation without a host of vacant retail stores and, in addition, the rental values of which were greatly enhanced, such abnormal but excellent condition speaks in thunder tones of the marvelous value of that most unjustly maligned national life saver, national prohibition.

Realty men should be foremost in the field to uphold the eighteenth amendment from purely selfish motives, and they will be supported by the great body of the people as it begins to be realized more and more that the staggeringly big sums uselessly and harmfully handed over to the saloon keepers to enrich a chosen few are now distributed among the people at large, so that millions benefit not only financially but in every possible good and useful manner.

The abolition of slavery has heretofore been the shining star of the United States of America, but that star now has a rival in the luster and glowing radiance of the star of national prohibition.

New York ranks lowest among all American cities in per-

New York ranks lowest among all American cities in percentage of home owners, only 12 per cent of the population living in their own homes. But prohibition and restricted immigration bid fair to Americanize New York.

And while Governor Smith, elected on an antiprohibition platform with an avowed campaign expenditure of over a mil-lion dollars, sends to Congress an idle plea for "beer and wine," there are others than real estate men in that metropolis who oppose return of booze. The Associated Press reported February 2:

Opposition to proposals for repeal of the State prohibition enforcement law and modification by Congress of the Volstead Act was expressed in a resolution adopted by the New York City Federation of Women's Clubs at their annual convention. The vote was approximately 1,300 to 100. POVERTY.

Public charity formerly expected that from 50 to 90 per cent of its cases of need-the rate depending on the thoroughness of the saturation of a city in the beverage-liquor traffic-would come from drink. To-day city after city reports that in 1921 and in 1922 keen-eyed and trained investigators find either no cases or else only a small decimal portion of the appeals for help are traceable to drink. Welfare workers, instead of repairing the damage done to families by the saloon-paying rent, buying coal or food or clothing-are to-day using their funds for fresh-air work, dental work for children, medical attendance and supervision, prenatal care of expectant mothers, in a score of constructive activities which replace the old-time repair work for the saloon's by-product.

The Boston Welfare Society reports cases in which intemperance is a factor for the past six years to have been as

The annual report of the Massachusetts S. P. C. C. for 1921 shows a diminution of 47.7 per cent in cases in which intemperance is a factor, compared with 1916. As a side light is the statement that in 144 selected families, in which there were 216 known alcoholics in 1916, there were only 94 in 1921.

Under date of February 8, 1923, Mr. Lawson Purdy, secretary of the Charity Organization Society of New York City, writes in response to my inquiry:

Our statistics show the number of families presenting the "problem of intemperance." These figures for certain years are as follows:

Dr. Thomas J. Riley, general secretary of the Brooklyn Bureau of Charities, says that prohibition is justifying the expectation of its supporters that it would do much to relieve the burdens of the poor. Regarding the definite results among the poor families helped by the bureau, Doctor Riley said very recently:

Of the families that come to the Bureau of Charities for aid, the percentage in which drunkenness is a cause of their need has declined from 12 per cent in 1916 to 4 per cent in 1922. In other words, 12 out of 100 families that came to us for help in 1916 had drunkenness in some member of the family to such a degree as to constitute a disability in that family, whereas last year there were only 4 out of 100; in 1920 the percentage was 6 and in 1921 it was 5.

Drunkenness as a disability that brings people to the family welfare society has shown a similar decrease in other places, as the following figures for 1919, when national prohibition went into effect, and 1921 will show: In Cleveland the percentage dropped from 11.15 in 1919 to 2.61 in 1921; in Boston from 10.63 to 2.25; in St. Louis from 6.03 to 0.70; in Milwaukee from 9.64 to 3.45; in New Haven, Conn., from 13 to 0.3; and in Rochester, N. Y., from 15.3 to 3.8. A similar reduction is shown in 29 cities for which the figures have been compiled recently.

These figures are all the more significant when we realize that 10 or 15 years ago disabling intemperance was listed in one-fourth or one-third of all the families that came to the charitable societies of the country. This decline is coincident with the spread of State and National prohibition and one who works with families can not escape the conviction that it is chiefly, if not wholly, due to the enforcement of prohibition, however faulty it may have been. These figures tend to confirm what Commander Evangeline Booth, of the Salvation Army, said almost a year ago, that since the enactment of the Volstead Act drunkenness among the poor has almost entirely of the Voise disappeared.

In Newark and Paterson, N. J., the decrease in charity cases due to intemperance averages 83 per cent for the three years of prohibition as compared with the three preceding wet

In considering the results of the first years of prohibition an important item for consideration is the increase or decrease in the number of public charges. One of the charges against the saloon was that it made paupers, that it brought the burden of support of hundreds on the taxpayers of the State. The following report is from records of the State of Michigan, filed by superintendents of the poor of the State. Figures are for 1917, the last year of the saloons in Michigan, and the last available compiled report, that of 1920. The figures show a substantial decrease in the number which the poor superintendents of the State find necessary to assist with the taxpayers' money:

Number maintained in infirmaries. Number given temporary relief. Permanent indigent maintained outside of infirmaries. Whole number receiving assistance in any form.	9, 269 43, 727 4, 102 58, 464	6,870 29,758 3,496 41,553

There was a decrease of 20 per cent in the amount of orphan children sent to State homes in Ohio in 1922, as compared with the last wet year.

HUMAN BETTERMENT.

The agencies which make for human betterment have felt the pulse of prohibition. In our public schools the attendance in the two extremes, the kindergarten and the high school, register the change in the Nation's economic and Improved home conditions, resurgent ambition, social life. funds now available for properly clothing and caring for the younger children, have made possible phenomenal increases in attendance in kindergarten schools. Equally, diversion of the wage earner's money from the bartender's till to the home has enabled children who formerly would have been compelled to leave school at the lowest age permitted by law, in order to add their mite to the family's income, to remain in school and fit themselves for fuller lives and a higher standard of living. Our colleges can not care for the throngs who seek their advantages to-day.

Church membership has grown amazingly. The 1921 report shows an increase of 1,200,000, the greatest increase made in Michigan has the cash, and the desire to spend it, for better schools and educational facilities now than it had during the reign of John Barleycorn in Michigan. More money is being spent in salaries for teachers, with the result that more capable people are being attracted to the profession and the children of Michigan are profiting thereby.

NATION'S AMUSEMENTS.

Even the Nation's amusements register the improvement in conditions. Not even education, savings banks deposits, insurance increases, or industry's gains absorb the productive dollars which once the brewer and distiller abstracted. Instead of drinking alone or with other topers in a saloon, men with their families are seen thronging our amusement places. A revival of common interests in families where father seldom found his diversion in former days with his wife and children is reported by welfare societies everywhere. The receipts of the moving-picture houses of America for 1921, the last year the compilation has been complete, show an increase of $633,000,000 over the last wet year, 1918. And those receipts are taxed; taxed twice in some places, by the State as well as by the Federal Government.

"Prohibition has been the greatest blessing baseball ever enjoyed," according to Thomas J. Hickey, president of the American Baseball Association, in a speech delivered a few weeks ago in Detroit. To prohibition he attributes the increased attendance at the games last season. "The season was a record breaker," said Mr. Hickey. "The passing of the saloon increased our patronage wonderfully. Regardless of the merit of the eighteenth amendment it was a great business booster for us."

BOOTLEGGING NO NOVELTY.

Against all these advantages we hear of the ravages of the kind of beverage sold by the bootlegger to-day. The bootlegger is the best advertised factor in our American life. He exists. He always has existed since laws were first devised to control the ungovernable traffics in intoxicants. Compare the official reports showing the number of Federal liquor licenses held in any community with the number of local-State or citylicenses and you will find the reason why "bootlegger" and "speak-easy" are not new terms invented since the eighteenth amendment was ratified but are ancient if not honorable terms. Besides these who secured themselves against Federal interference while they sold liquor without a local license, there were uncounted numbers who held no license at all but sold seven days a week.

When there were 1,600 licensed saloons in Detroit there were more than that number of "blind pigs" paying Federal license.

In Massachusetts, in the year 1910—a year uncomplicated by war, panic, or prohibition-there was one bootlegger or speakeasy holding a Federal license but having no local license for each 1,479 of the population of license towns and cities; and one for each 3,557 of the population in no-license towns and cities. Twice as many per capita where liquor was licensed as where it was not. The bootlegger is like the buffalo, a historic but vanishing feature of our American scenery.

The toll of deaths from bootleg booze is inconsiderable, compared with the record of the licensed liquor business. These are the official figures from the United States Census Bureau: Deaths from alcoholism in 1917 were 5.2 per 100,000 of our population. Then came the influenza year. The alcoholics were carried off like flies in that year, but a kindlier diagnosis covered a multitude of sins and made comparisons impossible. But war-time prohibition cut the 1919 rate to 1.6 and 1920 dropped to 1 per 100,000. That means that if the wet year ratio of 5.2 had prevailed in 1920, 44,424 more persons would have died of alcoholism than did die of that disease. The reports from the few establishments still surviving to care for alcoholics indicate that 1921 and 1922 will show alcoholism reduced to the vanishing point as a cause of death. Bootleg whisky is dangerous; it is fatal in the long run; but where it slays its hundreds, the regular bar whisky of the wet and license era slew its many thousands.

ENFORCEMENT OF PROHIBITION,

Enforcement of prohibition is not 100 per cent efficient. Nothing that depends on human agencies is, has been, or ever will be. But its efficiency is surprising when we consider the effort expended. In the Federal enforcement there are only 2,000 field agents at work. The total staff, including stenographers, clerks, etc., is only 3,000. With these 2,000 men in the field, marvels have been accomplished. Philadelphia alone with 4,000 policemen never was able to curb the lawless although licensed saloon keeper as her court records evidence. We are policing a nation with half as many men.

Two thousand years in jail; more than $5,000,000 in fines! These are the collective penalties paid by violators of the national prohibition law on convictions in the Federal courts for the entire United States since July, 1921.

There have been 58,862 cases in the 18-months' period reported to the 88 Department of Justice offices in the United States. United States attorneys, acting for the Department of Justice, have secured 27,301 convictions with jail sentences aggregating 2,045 years 11 months and 24 days, and fines totaling $5,220,558.02. There were pending on the dockets of the Federal courts 21,850 cases undisposed of on December 1, 1922, with over 3,000 new cases developing every month.

Attorney General Daugherty has been and is constantly frecting United States attorneys throughout the country to clean up their dockets and keep them clean." The reflex of the reports now being received his orders is being evidenced by the reports now being received at the Department of Justice.

The Federal courts in States that were "dry" before national prohibition laws became effective have less crowded dockets than those in former "wet" States, the detailed reports indi-This, the Attorney General said, is due largely to the fact that most of the liquor prosecutions in the "dry are taken under the local State prohibition laws, and it is only in certain of the more important cases, notably those involving conspiracy, that it has been found advisable for the Federal

The reports would seem to indicate, it was said, that the crowded condition of the Federal dockets was due for the most part to the fact that the prohibition burden was not being shared by the State courts, except in one or two States, notably Kansas and Wisconsin. It seemed possible, Government offi-Kansas and Wisconsin. It seemed possible, Government offi-cials said, that other States could reduce the number of pending cases if they so desired.

In Kansas, where the State laws are being enforced in preference to the national prohibition act because they provide more severe penalties, the Federal courts have the cleanest dockets. The southern district of New York, which includes New York City, shows the heaviest congestion, and to Maryland the credit is due for having brought to trial and disposed of the largest percentage of prohibition cases in any Federal district. In the case of Maryland, however, it is pointed out that no prosecutions are had in the State courts and that the whole burden of enforcing the dry laws is put on the Federal courts.

The small number of Federal prosecutions in the former "dry" States, including Kentucky, does not mean that the Federal prohibition agents are not kept busy in those States. They make raids and seizures the same as elsewhere, but the cases which come as a result of their activities are usually third in the State courts.

tried in the State courts.

Wisconsin is another State in which most of the prohibition cases are prosecuted in the State courts. A notable list of conspiracy and robbery cases growing out of the prohibition laws, however, have been handled in the Federal courts. The sentences given in these cases were heavy, compared with those in other districts, the average being for each conviction a fine of $2,326 and a jail sentence of six and one-half months. The reports of the western district of Wisconsin show that over 200 cases were turned over to the State authorities and that all those instituted in the Federal courts have been practically finished.

As might be expected, the most crowded docket of all is found in the southern district of New York (including New York City). During the last fiscal year there were 64 trials with 937 convictions, showing that in most of the cases pleas of guilty were entered. The following seizures were made during the fiscal year 1922:

During the calendar year ended December 31, 1922, approximately 85,700 basic permits of all classes were issued; 3,572 applications for permits were disapproved; and 2,185 permits were recalled and revoked.

There was a marked decrease in withdrawals of distilled spirits during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1922. In that year 2,724,363.4 proof gallons of spirits other than alcohol were taxpaid for consumption, which quantity is 6,353,782.1 proof gallons less than the amount taxpaid for consumption during the fiscal year 1921. DOES PROHIBITION PAY?

The gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. Gallivan and Mr. TINKHAM] might well devote their study to the experience of their own State. If happiness is better than misery, if comfort is better than poverty, if reason is better than insanity, if sobriety is better than drunkenness, if clean lives lived in freedom beside happy firesides are better than crime-burdened lives darkened by prison walls, Massachusetts should raise no voice on this floor against prohibition, should never preach nullification of the eighteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Only once has any careful study been made by official au-Only once has any careful study been made bliquors, and thority of the relation between beer, distilled liquors, and thority of the relation between beer, distilled liquors, and thority of the relation between beer, distilled liquors, and thority of the relation between beer, distilled liquors, and liquors generally upon pauperism, crime, and insanity. was in Massachusetts in 1895, when the State bureau of labor statistics, by order of the legislature, collected an enormous body of data which was published as Public Document No. 15, 1896, by Massachusetts. In the summary of this data, covering over 400 pages, are the following facts: Of the paupers cared for in the State, 74.19 per cent were addicted to the use of intoxicants, 15.63 per cent to excessive use of them. Their own intemperance had reduced 39.44 per cent to destitution. Beer and malt liquors only were used by 20 per cent, 2 per cent used only distilled liquors, while 77 per cent of the users of intoxicants used two or more kinds of liquor.

Of the prisoners in the State 65.89 per cent had been committed for drunkenness and 2.46 per cent additional for drunkenness joined to some other offense; 81.97 per cent had been drunk at the time the crime was committed and 43.13 per cent were drunk when it was planned, in cases where drunkenness was not the charge on which they were sentenced. Their own in-temperance was the cause of 84.41 per cent of these prisoners falling into crime. Of the total number of prisoners, 57.89 per cent had intemperate fathers and 20.49 per cent had intemperate mothers. Seventeen per cent of the users of intoxicants among the prisoners used beer and malt liquors only, 3 per cent used distilled liquors only, while 80 per cent used two or more kinds

Of the insane in Massachusetts, 37 per cent were users of alcoholic drinks, 16.94 per cent drinking to excess. Of the cases where the cause of insanity had been determined, 25.43 per cent were due to alcohol. Of the cases where the family history was known, 68.67 per cent had an intemperate parent or parents. Where history of the grandparents was known, 51.98 per cent of the cases showed that intemperance of the grandparents had led to insanity in the case considered. Of the insane in the State, 18 per cent used only beer and wine or malt liquors, 5 per cent used distilled liquors only, while 75 per cent used two or more kinds of drink.

New Jersey has protested prohibition more loudly than perhaps any other State, and yet her suffering is not intense. A study has just been made by J. Edward Tompkins, of Rahway, N. J., for the New Jersey Temperance Society, showing startling accomplishments by prohibition even where enforcement only two years preceding prohibition, or 1918 and 1919.

Jack O'Donnell, special writer for Collier's, said in that weekly for February 10, 1923: "I am a wet; I always have been and always shall be." Sent out by Collier's to find out "if the sentiment of the people is changing in favor of modification or repeal of the Volstead Act," he sums the results of his investigation:

I was load to admit it even to myself, but there is an abundance of evidence that a great "dry wave" is rolling eastward, slowly but surely grinding down opposition to prohibition. And, riding the crest of this wave, are the clean, substantial citizens of the Nation—the John Smiths and the Tom Browns—and always their wives and sisters and mothers are riding at their sides.

Some day we wets are going to awaken to find that an overwhelming majority of the people of the United States are weary of bootleggers and dry-law violators. Some day, and that day is not far distant, these people are going to rid the country of the bootlegger and the rum runner just as the vigilantes of the fifties rid the California mining camps of undesirable gamblers, gunmen, and prostitutes.

To secure for our people the fullest measure of blessings from prohibition, we must have enforcement. Whatever the cost we will have enforcement, and whatever the cost America will be the gainer by effective prohibition.

We have heard Massachusetts protesting the cost of prohibition, preaching nullification, attacking organizations that stand preeminently for law and order. I am glad that it was a dis-tinguished citizen of Massachusetts, Dr. Albert Bushnell Hart, foremost living American historian, and professor of history and constitutional government in Harvard University, who recently said, speaking before the National Republican Club of New York City:

There are no more dangerous radicals than those who violate the Volstead law because they don't like it, and because they believe it infringes upon their personal liberties.

In response to country-wide call for further statement of his views, Doctor Hart gave the Boston Sunday Globe of February 25 a statement on radicalism in which he said in part:

views, Doctor Hart gave the Boston Sunday Globe of February 25 a statement on radicalism in which he said in part:

The chief dangers at present to the peace of the United States and the success of our free institutions, appear to come from various groups who actively support all the principles of the Constitution except those disagreeable to them. For instance, the most serious and widespread opposition to the Government of the United States of America and the State governments at this moment is made up of hundreds of thousands of dangerous radicals who are opposed to the eighteenth amendment.

Most of them have been opposed to it at all its stages and long before it was made a part of the fundamental law. Having been overwhelmingly defeated in that opposition, they are now attempting to undermine the confidence of the people of the United States in the supremacy of the Federal Constitution and the principle of majority rule by assailing the formal and recorded judgment of the Nation, expressed through the process of amendment.

This body of dangerous radicals is made up of two main groups: The roaring, rampant bootleggers, and the otherwise respectable customers and defenders of the bootleggers, and the otherwise respectable customers and defenders of the bootleggers, who insist upon the superconstitutional right to drink what, where, and when they please. Their objection to the eighteenth amendment is in essence exactly that of Lord Melbourne a century ago, when he went to church and the minister preached against a favorite vice of his lordship's. "Things have come to a pretty pass," said Melbourne, "when religion invades the sphere of private life."

According to their own account, the besiegers of the eighteenth amendment are poor, weak, and inept creatures, who find no means of preventing a minority in the two Houses of Congress and in each of the 45 ratifying State legislatures from putting over a measure to which the greater part of the people of the United States in all parts of the country were strong traffic under certain conditions. Never has any amendment to the Federal Constitution been so long discussed, so hotly contested, so thoroughly aired as the amendment against the sale and public use of intoxicating liquors.

One of the most dangerous of those extreme radicals is President Nicholas Murray Butler of Columbia College, who has put himself on public record with respect to the fifteenth and eighteenth amendments to the effect that "they are not obeyed by large numbers of highly intelligent and morally sensitive people" * * "the revolt against it * * * is nation-wide," * * "the opponents of the amendment are not likely to recognize themselves as in the minority and to obey the law at least within the lifetime of any man now living."

amendment are not have an east within the lifetime of any man accurated to obey the law at least within the lifetime of any man accurated in the war he detected one of his professors in the dangerous radicalism of writing private letters to Members of Congress asking them to vote for a bill then pending before Congress. Subsequently the authorities of Columbia, with whom it must be supposed that President Butler was in sympathy, restored that radical professor to his right of a retiring allowance, paying him $18,000 cash for withheld arrears.

On the other hand, to seek a change of government is one of the perogatives of freedom, and well our Revolutionary ancestors knew it. At the beginning of the Revolution, if we are to believe the positive statements of John Adams and Thomas Jefferson, the friends of the existing British Government were more numerous than those who insisted upon a recognition by Great Britain of the freedom that they had acquired.

Therefore, the conservatives of that time found the most dangerous radicalism in James Otis, and Patrick Henry, and Samuel Adams, and Peyton Randolph, and John Adams, and Benjamin Franklia, yes, and George Washington. Those were the men who were trying to make things different.

When they succeeded and had the majority, their first step was to set up definite written constitutions for the States and Nation. They expected obedience to their laws and made short work with the Tories, who insisted that you must not change old-established practices unless you could get something like unanimity. They began to ignore the old rights of property in slaves. Those patriots founded a splendid and lasting Government, because they built upon the idea that in an orderly community people must obey written laws. As one of them said: "If the majority will not yield, the minority must, or there is an end of government."

The friends of good government ought to stand together against all those throughout the country who, on whatever pretext, apply themselves to disobedience and violation of the law. Such men, however lofty their assertion of virtue, however tearful their appeal to the right of private judgment above the law, are hostile to the liberty of their country and are attempting to break down republican government. They are all dangerous radicals.

It is radicalism no less dangerous to oppose enforcement of the law as to others than to violate it one's own self. radicalism no less dangerous to unjustly attack, to besmirch and to be smudge those who are attempting to enforce the law, or those individuals or organizations leading in the great national those individuals or organizations leading in the great national struggle for law enforcement. It is radicalism no less dangerous to broadcast to the country insinuations and loose charges that give the country an unfair estimate of Congress and do gross injustice to the average Member of this House.

In a January issue of the War Cry, Commander Evangeline Booth made this eloquent appeal:

My God, Thou knowest it! Shall America go back?

Drink has drained more blood, hung more crepe, sold more homes, plunged more people into bankruptcy, armed more villains, slain more children, snapped more wedding rings, defiled more innocence, blinded more eyes, twisted more limbs, dethroned more reason, wrecked more manhood, dishonored more womanhood, broken more hearts, blasted more lives, driven more to suicide, and dug more graves than any other poisoned scourge that ever swept its death-dealing waves across the world.

more lives, driven more to suicide, and dug more graves than any other poisoned scourge that ever swept its death-dealing waves across the world.

Can it be that men and women are so bewildered by selfishness, and beset by appetite, that they will take again into their national life, into the bosom of their homes, this baneful, loathsome, reeking, wrecking abomination?

Shall America go back?

Let me ask you to step back to the days of the wide-swung doors of the saloon. Let me tear the film from the eyes of men who are blinded by mercenary gains and selfish appetite. Let me point the mothers and fathers of every status of life to the handwriting on the wall of the Nation, and bid you read what is written there. Such trembling strokes—such weak, shaky characters—such long spaces between the words; words ill-formed—words ill-spelled—words ill-placed. Such simple little sentences, but vastly comprehensive—such faint impress, but never to be obliterated. Whose are the fingers that have wielded the trembling pen—the thin fingers—the misshapen fingers—the twisted fingers? Whose is the writing? Why, it is the handwriting of the children—the handwriting of the children, across the wall of the Nation—stretching from sea to sea:

Ah! You can hush to silence all other voices of national and individual complaint; you may make mute every other tongue, even of mothers of destroyed sons and daughters, of wives of profligate husbands; but let the children, the abused children, the starved children, the deserted children, the abused children, the starved children, the deserted children, the nameless children, the starved children, the deserted children, the basten children, the starved children, the deserted children, the nameless children, the starved children, the deserted children, the basten children, the blind children. Omy God, this army of little children! Let their little faces, pinched by want of gladness, be heeded! Let their challenge, though made by small forms—too mighty for estimate—be reckoned with!

flax and bruised reed, the chorus thrills on and on and on until it is caught up by ten thousand times ten thousand voices of faith and hope and love and liberty. Still on and on in jubilant song it wings its way. Mothers in the cottage sing it, the sick in the hospital join in it, the children on the school bench lift it, the convict in the prison cell catches it, the striplings of new character in this new day, shout it.

Still on and on it rolls in volume through garret and palace, over hill and through date—on and on, ever onward and upward until the dear ones in Glory catch this refrain and with all the redeemed, their faces shining, join their silver tones that send their echoes along the everlasting hills, fill all Heaven with gladness and ring in the eternal jubilee.

America—America shall not go back!

Recently President Harding summed it up in this:

In every community men and women have had an opportunity now to know what prohibition means. They know that debts are more promptly paid; that men take home the wages once wasted in saloons; that families are better clothed and fed, and more money finds its way into the savings banks. The liquor traffic was destructive of much that was most precious in American life. In the face of so much evidence on that point what conscientious man would want to let his own selfish desires influence him to vote to bring it back? In another generation, I believe, liquor will have disappeared not merely from our politics but from our memories.

PLAY THE GAME OF SELF-GOVERNMENT PAIRLY.

Let me commend to the gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN and Mr. TINKHAM], to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Hill], and to every opponent of prohibition who sits in high place anywhere in America, what William H. Taft said February 5, 1919, before assuming his present high post as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States:

Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States:

This is a democratic Government, and the voice of the people expressed through the machinery provided by the Constitution for its expression and by constitutional majorities is supreme. Every loyal citizen must obey. This is the fundamental principle of free government. Those who oppose passage of practical measures to enforce the amendment, which itself declares the law and gives to Congress the power and duty to enforce it, promote the nonenforcement of this law and the consequent demoralization of all law. This was the evil result of the amendment prophesied, and they are thus doing all they can to vindicate their view. Such a course is unpatriotic and is not playing the game of self-government fairly.

Agitate for repeal all you please, though you know as I do that there is no prospect of repeal of the eighteenth amendment, but do not preach nullification. Neither by precept nor by example should any of us put any straw in the way of enforcement, but rather the blood of every patriot that has ever been sacrificed in war to establish and maintain the Republic and its institutions calls upon us daily to support as loyally and with the same spirit of sacrifice that same Republic and its institutions in critical days of peace, calls upon us to stand firm for the Constitution from the first of the preamble to its latest amendment. Prohibition welcomes the test of experience. It is puerile to measure dollars against the lessening of crime, poverty, and disease. It is madness to urge the liberty to get drunk and a free road to ruin for self and others innocent as more to be desired than a sober and happy Nation, freeing itself as much as may be from crime, poverty, and disease. Play the game of self-government fairly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The extension of remarks referred to is here printed in full as follows:

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, in Washington's last message he expressed the hope that there will be established "an institution for the general diffusion of knowledge," and in his will he said, "I have long thought of a plan whereby knowledge could be spread in a systematic way through my beloved country.

To carry out the wish of that great leader of men, the statesman and patriot to whom not only our own people but all humanity owes a debt of gratitude, the George Washington Memorial Association was organized and incorporated. While the expression "diffusion of knowledge" naturally kindles visions of schools and colleges, libraries and forums, it is in the broader sense that the association intends to carry out this purpose. By national conventions and international conferences, by meetings of societies and organizations, whose deliberations on the subjects under discussion will be broadcasted, will the work of education be accomplished. Politics, economics, finance, history, art, literature, science, jurisprudence, and, indeed, every field of effort augmentative of knowledge is encompassed in the aims of the association.

Imbued with the purpose of extending knowledge, it will be reared as a monument to patriotism-an everlasting memorial to the heroic men and women of the land whose sacrifice and service it is our privilege to honor and emulate. It will stand an enduring tribute to those whose achievements in the great war are written in eternal glory. It will perpetuate the deeds they wrought and the examples they gave to the world-an abiding inspiration to those who follow after. Consecrated to patriotism it will link the past with the future and in commemorating the fame that has been won will give the promise that the lessons taught were not taught in vain.

To visualize this great memorial let me quote from Major

"As the curtain descends on the last act in the greatest drama of all history comes the consciousness of a demand for a fitting token in commemoration of the deeds of American

"The Nation's heart pumps quick with emotion at the sight of her returning heroes; it bleeds with the wounds which her manhood has suffered; it swells with justifiable pride at her thorough, decisive achievement. The whole Nation, as though actuated by a single mind, desires a perpetual tribute to those millions of her men who saved the day for self-government and brought peace to a stricken world.

"And so the George Washington Memorial Association arose to the occasion. Its project already is under way—a National Victory Memorial Building, which will link the glories of Washington and Pershing, the spirit of '17 and the spirit of '76. The mettle which endured at Valley Forge triumphed in the Argonne. The men of '76 sleep in peace!

"What, indeed, more fitting than a linking up, for all time, of these great epochs of American life? Where, indeed, a place more suitable for such acknowledgment of a Nation's debt to her men than the Nation's capital?

"Congress has granted the George Washington Memorial Association an ideal location on the Mall, in the center of the city of Washington, which formerly was occupied by the Pennsylvania Station "On this site will be erected immediately, according to designs which have been selected, a majestic monument-not a monument in the accepted meaning of the term, but a monument in the form of a spacious and architecturally beautiful building, to be the center of both American and world activity. national memorial structure at Washington is to be apart from the many arches and columns and shafts to be erected in local communities. It is to be a practical monument to the memory and eternal honor of the Nation's men and women.

"The central feature of the edifice will be a national auditorium of spacious dimensions, thus giving to the Nation's Capital what, strangely enough, it now entirely lacks, a public meeting place of ample size. It will be completely canopied by an acoustical dome three times the diameter of the dome of St. Peter's. This auditorium will seat 7,000 people and will consist of a main floor of 38,500 square feet, and a gallery of 10,000 square feet. Here in the future will be held inaugural receptions, national and international conventions and conferences, concerts, public ceremonies, and celebrations.

"About the main auditorium will be grouped a number of small halls which will be used for the smaller meetings of various military, patriotic, scientific, educational, and like gather-

"On the ground floor, each side of the main auditorium, will be rooms set aside as museums for the archives and relics of the Nation's great struggles for liberty.

Space will be provided for public and private documents and records relating to the war, thus furnishing a repository for the preservation and study of important papers.

"On the second floor there will be a great banquet hall, where banquets attendant upon meetings or occasions of national importance may be held in surroundings of fitting dig-On this floor also will be rooms for the permanent national headquarters of military and other patriotic organiza-tions, such as the Grand Army of the Republic, the American Legion, societies of veterans, of reserve officers, and so on.
"Not only will the building stand as a memorial for the Nation as a whole but a spacious room will be set apart for the exclusive use of each of the States of the Union and of the Territories of the United States.

The fourth floor is arranged for additional offices for the use of various societies whose objects are to promote the welfare of the United States.

"To construct, equip, and endow the building in a manner commensurate with the high ideals and brave deeds which it is to commemorate will require $10,000,000.

"The George Washington Memorial Association has been authorized by Congress to raise the money with which to erect this memorial building on the site granted free by Congress.

"The association has charge of the raising of the necessary funds and also of the erection and equipment of the building. The National Society of Fine Arts has approved the plans from many submitted in competition by more than a dozen of the country's leading architects. After completion the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of which the President of the United States is chairman ex officio, will have control of the administration of the building, and they will also be the trustees of the endowment fund. The association has already received by popular subscription over a half million dollars. Many thousands more have been pledged.

"It is intended to raise the $10,000,000 required for this worthy purpose in a brief nation-wide campaign. From the enthusiastic responses already received there is no doubt of the happy outcome of this campaign.

"A great war, nobly undertaken, bravely and victoriously fought, proving that after the lapse of nearly 150 years the hopes, principles, and aspirations of the founders of the Nation are still cherished, will thus receive adequate national memorial acknowledgment.

"What the Pantheon is to France, Westminster Abbey to Britain, such in some degree and manner the National Victory Memorial will be to America. Greatly conceived, nationally erected, dedicated to patriotism, it will stand through the generations as the national monument raised in the awful presence of the world's greatest political convulsion to commemorate the victorious feats of American democracy in arms. Hallowed by the passage of time, stored with the pictures and sculpturary that will record the achievements of the Republic and its conspicuous sons from age to age, it will become the mecca of American patriotism and an inexhaustible source of stimulation to national duty and service.

"You gave your sons, you gave your services, that democracy might live. The opportunity is now offered to perpetuate the memory of your sons' great deeds and your own sacrifices.

SERVICE-STAR PLAN.

"The service-star plan, by which the fund to erect the National Victory Memorial Building is to be raised, was submitted to many representative men and women and national organizations and numerous commercial, financial, industrial, and educational institutions, and was approved by them.

"It will be recalled that early in the war every family, business house, club, college, factory, community, or institution of any sort took up the practice of displaying flags with a star thereon for each member of the organization serving with the colors; hence the name 'service flag.' These flags were displayed as a mark of honor, respect, and gratitude to the service men and as a proud proof of the organization's repre-sentation in the war effort. To the boys themselves the thought that somewhere at home at least one service flag had a star that represented him individually had a tremendously inspiring and gratifying effect. It seemed as if a shining symbol of his sacrificial spirit had been left at home to cheer his dear ones. And mothers, fathers, brothers, sisters, and sweethearts and organizations did derive solace and pride from those stars. They also meant much of inspiration and cheer to all of us who remained behind. Wherever one went there was always before his eyes a stimulus to his own patriotic bit, whatever it was, in these reminders of how much more others were doing. These flags will remain indefinitely among the treasured relics and records of families and all manner of associations of men

"The central idea of the service-star plan is to have every one of the more than 4,000,000 service stars placed in the ceiling of the Victory Memorial Building, thus in effect making a great national service flag which will for all time be a visual record and reminder of what each and all of the 'boys' did; a blue star for every survivor, a gold one for each who gave his life in the service, with the initials of every man marking his own star. Supplementing the stars will be the records of honor of the men and women who sacrificed and toiled behind the lines that victory might be ours.

"In fact, the whole great National Victory Memorial Building will be, figuratively, the Nation's service flag, thus preserving in the national recollection and consciousness what is so sacredly preserved in every home, for every brick and stone in it will proceed from the idea and the idealism of the service

Three Presidents and many public men have strongly indorsed the plan.

Hon. William H. Taft:

"The memorial must be accomplished on a magnificent scale."

Hon. Woodrow Wilson:

'I have noted with genuine interest the plans of the George Washington Memorial Association for a memorial to the boys of 1917 as well as those of '76. No one could withhold approval from such plans. They undoubtedly express what the heart

The White House,
Washington, April 16, 1921.

My Dear Mrs. Dimock: There are some special considerations that have appealed to me, and which I have not seen presented to the public so often as I could wish, commending the project of the George Washington Memorial Association.

You are proposing a truly national memorial to the men and women who made America's part in the World War what it was. That in itself is very much; it ought to insure the fullest measure of popular support. But, beyond this, I have been impressed that there are special reasons in this instant for the creation of such a memorial.

In a few years there will be almost no mementoes in our own country of the service of Americans in the world's greatest struggle. Its battles were fought on foreign soil and distant seas. Other skies than our will arch over the fields where our sons and brothers won glory and splendidly served mankind.

Of our other wars we have many and appealing memorials scattered throughout our country. Of this we have few, and as the years pass we will have yet fewer. Therefore it has seemed to me especially fitting that such a national memorial as your association proposes should be created here in the National Capital as a testimony and a shrine of national patriotism.

Your plan includes features which appeal both to exalted sentiment and to the thought of substantial utility, and in this regard I feel that it has a unique merit.

You have my best wishes for the completest measure of success.

Most sincerely yours,

Mrs. Henry F. Dimock,

Warren G. Hardyne.

WARREN G. HARDING. Washington, D. C.

The cornerstone of this great edifice was laid on November 14, 1921, with fitting ceremonies, the Hon. John W. Weeks, Secretary of War, presiding.

President Harding gave expression to these inspiring

"There begins here to-day the fulfillment of one of the striking contemplations contained in the last will of the Father of his Country. It is an impressive fact, worthy of our especial thought, that in the century and a half since Washington became the leader, the heart and soul, of its struggle for independence and unity, this Nation has so many times found occasions to record devotion to the precepts which he laid down for its guidance. So to-day, after more than a century's delay, we are come to pay tribute to the foresight which first encouraged and endowed the institution here established—an institution which is to be alike a monument to those who sacrificed in a noble cause and a beacon to shed afar the light of useful knowledge and grateful understanding among men. For I need not remind you that Washington, in his last will and testament, first conceived the idea which we here see shaping into forms that shall combine loftiest sentiment and truest utility. He proposed and gave a bequest to found an institution to disseminate learning, culture, and a proper understanding of right principles in government. In furtherance of that purpose patriotic women and men have made possible the institution of which we are now to lay the corner. Very properly they have conceived Washington's impelling thought to have been a gathering place for Americans where American minds could meet in fruitful exchanges. We can better appraise this thought when we recall the limited publicity, the slow transportation, and the difficult process of translating public sentiment of his day.

"Mindful of this inspiration for the achievement of to-day, I have thought it might be well to direct attention to some phases of Washington's character which are not so well known as they deserve and which are wonderfully set forth in the provisions of his last will and testament.

"It has seemed to me that our studies of Washington have been too much from those public sides from which we view him as the military chief, the inspired leader of the Colonies, the statesman and guide of Constitution-making times, welding force which hammered fragments of communities into a great Nation; as the first President, and as the author of that body of domestic and foreign policies which he bequeathed in his Farewell Address. All this we know, but we have not gathered all of inspiration that waits to reward the contemplation of the virtues and ideals that made Washington, on his private and personal side, a very model of good citizenship.

"Perhaps there has never been a nation which has owed so much to one man as our Republic owes to Washington. youth, filled with the spirit of adventure and exploration, he came early to know the Colonies and our nearest Northwest. In the epoch of the Seven Years' War, or, as we call it, the French and Indian War, his leadership was perhaps the contribution which saved this continent to assured dominion of the English-speaking colonists. Indeed, I think it may be said that if on the one side Washington was the great personal force that wrenched apart the two chief branches of the Englishspeaking race, he was on the other the greatest personal factor in saving this continent to Anglo-Saxon domination, and, in doing that, he contributed very greatly to making possible the wide-flung family of English-speaking nations. If, as leader of the revolting Colonies in 1776, this time aided by France, he tore them from the grasp of England, it is equally true that two decades earlier he had saved them from the possible domination of France. I am sure that to-day our faithful friends and trusted allies of France and England alike would agree that in both cases, viewed in the light of subsequent events, he served mankind well.

With all these things we are reasonably familiar. We know his career as organizer and leader of colonial forces in the Seven Years' War; as generalissimo of the pendence; as chairman of the Constitutional Convention; as first President; as author of that Farewell Address whose fund of wisdom has contributed so much to shape our national poli-cles even to this day.

"But among the documents which attest his wisdom there is one to which little study has been given. I mean his last will and testament. On an occasion such as brings us here to-day it is not inappropriate to direct attention for a few moments to this remarkable instrument.

Washington was not only a great soldier and a great statesman; he was also a man of great business affairs, and an eminent humanitarian. Provident and always methodical, he amassed a fortune, which has been rated by many as the greatest of his time in all the country. Had it been his desire to found a monumental estate, the vast tracts of carefully selected land of which he was possessed, and in whose future value he had the utmost confidence, would have constituted its ample foundation. But plainly it was not his belief that society is best served by the transmission from generation to generation of such imposing aggregates of wealth. Therefore his will, after devising minor and largely sentimental bequests to many relatives and friends, directed that the residuary estate should be divided into 23 equal shares, to be distributed among the heirs whom he named. Thus it comes about that an estate which, if held together and wisely administered, might have become very large, was deliberately so distributed that in a few years its entity was gone, and its portions had been absorbed into the general body of the country's wealth. If that process of disintegration and absorption involved some loss, it is probable that in the sum of results the Nation was gainer by the policy of Washington.

Washington as a model citizen shines forth with a peculiar radiance from this last testament. The first provision is that his debts shall be paid promptly. All the world needs the example of kept obligations. The second item makes generous provision for his wife; and then comes the direction that at her death all his slaves shall be given freedom; that those who need it shall be cared for by his estate; and that they all 'are to be taught to read and write, and are to be brought up to some useful occupation.'

"Next follow devises of funds to aid education of poor or orphaned children and for the endowment of a 'university in a central part of the United States.' Another specific bequest goes to Liberty Hall Academy, now Washington and Lee University, at Lexington, Va. A list of debtors are forgiven their debts. To each of five nephews he gave one of his swords with an injunction not to unsheath them for the purpose of shedding blood except it be for self-defense or in defense of their country and its rights, and in the latter case to keep them unsheathed and prefer falling with them in their hands to the relinquishment thereof.' There is no selection of words wherewith more eloquently to express the full duty and obligation of a good citizen to his country! Let us be thankful that the spirit of that injunction has been borne in upon the nation he founded and animates it even to this day.

"As a charter of good citizenship and patriotic purposes this last will and testament has been an inspiration many times to me. I commend its thoughtful reading to whoever would emulate his example. Indeed, as we are gathered here, representatives of a grateful and reverent nation, to signalize the con-summation of one more public beneficence inspired by him, I can think of nothing more appropriate than to urge the study of the Farewell Address and the last will and testament as complements of each other. Neither of them can be fully appre-ciated without the other. The Farewell Address was the final adjuration of the soldier, the statesman, the founder. The will and testament was the last word of the Christian citizen, the loving husband, the devoted kinsman—and the provident man of business. Studied together, they afford a complete key to the exalted character of one whom all mankind has learned Beyond that I am prone to believe they contain a chart by which the captains and pilots of a world in distress, seeking harborage from battering storms and raging, unknown deeps, might well lay the course of civilization itself.

Within a brief century and a half the American people, under Washington's inspiration, have created a great Nation, added to the dominion of liberty and of opportunity, and, we may hope, afforded a helpful example to the world. It has not been accomplished without heavy sacrifices. At fearful cost we had to wipe out an ambiguity in the Constitution and reestablish union where disunion threatened. In a conflict wellnigh as wide as the world we were called to draw the sword for humanity and the relief of oppression. Very recently we have paused to speak tribute to those who sacrificed in that struggle for civilization's preservation. We can not too often or too earnestly repeat that tribute; and we consecrate this institution as a memorial and a shrine, in reminder to all the future of the services and sacrifices of our heroes of the World

The President was followed by General Pershing, who said: "Within the last few days an unknown soldier of the Republic has been mourned by a grateful people, and the sympathetic heart of the Nation has silently wept at his tomb. Throughout the impressive ceremonies we again recalled his eager preparation and training; we followed him across the sea and saw him in the trenches; we watched him enter the battle, full of confidence, at a moment more critical than has yet been told; we stood beside him when he fell.

"He is our very own. Though we can not call his name, we knew him intimately as our comrade beside whom we fought. His courage was superb, and he knew no fear. His boyish face only smiled at adversity. He gave freely of his own exalted spirit. To the war-worn allies he pointed the way The last sad rites are over. The echo of the last to victory. salvo has died away. He sleeps in beautiful Arlington, a symbol of a people's sacrifice.

The Nation now turns to the fulfillment of its obligation to him and his comrades. At no time in history has humanity been confronted with more stupendous problems. The supreme test of the judgment of men is about to be made. If this world conference should fail, then we but hand down to posterity strife more bitter than that through which we have passed, and leave our boasted civilization well-nigh stranded.

"But we shall not fail. The hearts of our people are filled with good will toward all other peoples. The spirit of the Nation was ably voiced at the opening of the conference by our great Chief Executive and leader. A frank, clear, and open declaration of our attitude and desires was made by the distinguished Secretary of State. Without doubt, these sentiments find their full echo in the breast of all peoples who have suffered the devastating evils of war. Widows and orphans cry aloud for their adoption. The demand is universal, and the hope of success runs high. Let our faith in Him who guides and directs remain unfaltering. Only the happly culmination we pray for will justify our sacrifices. It alone will be the crowning glory of those whose valor made it possible.

brance to them. It is fitting, at this time, that we should lay the corner stone of this great building, where in the years to come our people from all over our country and the world may gather with peaceful purpose. It will be a worthy memorial to the devotion and patriotism of our victorious Armies in the Great War, and let us fervently hope that it will also be a monument to that new era of international relationship and friendliness which alone will guarantee a lasting peace

The last speaker was Admiral Coontz, whose address follows: "I consider it a high honor to be here this afternoon as the representative of the Navy in these exercises and also in my capacity as commander general of the Military Order of Foreign Wars of the United States. Being a Mason, I am always glad to attend the laying of corner stones. On several occasions I have been present when a corner stone was opened up a hundred or more years after its first being laid and, of course, things of immeasurable value are naturally unearthed. It is a great pity that they did not begin laying corner stones previous to the time of Solomon, for if we could only go back to the ancient times in Arabia and India and China, what wonderful history we could get from them. They say the Chinese records go back 4,400 years, and we imagine what we would find in Chinese corner stones.

"It must be with a feeling of pride that Mrs. Dimock and her colaborers look upon this day, because from now on there is a practical certainty that the building will be completed and the wonderful plan carried out. The part that appeals the most to me is the plan for the stars; to think that it is possible and projected that each individual who took part in the regular forces of the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps can have a star placed in the building for him with his name or initials attached is wonderful to contemplate. Can you not imagine the children, the grandchildren, and the great-grandchildren of the Great War people making Washington a mecca to visit to look for their ancestor's star. I am a great believer in tradition, for it is only in the contemplation of great and noble deeds in the past that we are led to the same in the present and the future.

We are now considering the great question of the limitation of armaments, and we ill wish this good work Godspeed, but we must not forget the teachings of history, and such armament as we have left must be fully equipped, prepared, and efficient, and we must not forget that personnel is still by far the greatest controlling factor. As a celebrated Virginian said, we desire in the United States to live in amity with all, but if the occasion should come in the future when some rash intruding foe should endeavor to take away from us any of the privileges of our sacred birthright, won by the blood of our heroes, then as multitudinous as the ocean waves the swords of our young men would flash from out their sheaths and strike in their avenging arm for freedom, home, and God, deeming their lives a paltry price for the bare privilege to fight for such a heritage."

The George Washington Memorial Association has complied with all the demands required by the law in connection with the construction of the George Washington Memorial Building on the Government land.

The plans of the building were approved by the Commission of Fine Arts on May 8, 1914. Upon the opinion of the Judge Advocate General of the Army, Colonel Sherrill authorized the George Washington Memorial Association to proceed with the necessary arrangements for the laying of the corner stone on November 14, 1921.

In a letter to Hon. John W. Weeks, Secretary of War, from the Attorney General on the construction of the law by the Department of Justice as relates to the George Washington Memorial Association relative to the site for the building, " rights of the association must now be determined altogether by the terms of the act of October 6, 1917," which act provided that within two years after the conclusion of the existing war the land referred to shall again be reserved for the erection of the George Washington Memorial Hall. The joint resolution of Congress of March 3, 1921, states that this war ended on March 3, 1921, and this brings the date within which the building must be commenced to March 3, 1923.

Colonel Sherrill, directed by the Secretary of War, has granted the George Washington Memorial Association permission to start work on the memorial building upon condition that the work is started before March 3, 1923.

The amount in subscriptions in the treasury of the association is over $500,000. This covers the provision that the actual construction of said building shall not be undertaken until the sum of $500,000 shall have been subscribed and paid into the treasury of the George Washington Memorial Association.

It is the ambition of the earnest men and women who are carrying forward the work of the association to make the structure, and all it stands for-a true shrine of national patriotism and the center of enlightenment. It is deserving of generous, enthusiastic encouragement.

To Mrs. Dimock, its president, whose untiring zeal and generosity have been potent factors in the work thus far so splendidly accomplished, and to all who have been associated with her, is due a tribute of appreclation.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

"For the amount required to pay the chief janitor of the House of Representatives the additional compensation authorized in the resolution of February 24, 1923, from March 4, 1923, to June 30, 1924, inclusive, $396.67."

Mr. MADDEN. This is in reference to the resolution passed in the House this morning.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

ARCHITECT OF THE CAPITOL.

Capitol buildings: For work at the Capitol and for general repairs thereof, including the same objects specified under this head in the act making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year 1923, $17,250.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I have never heard it stated on the floor by the chairman of any committee what the total cost was to the Government of maintaining the Capitol. Here we are appropriating additional funds of $17,250. What does it cost really to run the Capitol Building of the United States?

Mr. MADDEN. It is quite difficult to get at, because it is distributed among the Architect of the Capitol, the Clerk of the House, the Commission on the House Office Building, and the Senate and the Senate Office Building.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much has been appropriated for expenditures for the so-called Architect of the Capitol, formerly Superintendent of the Capitol?

Mr. MADDEN. For what period?

Mr. STAFFORD. For a year. I have been trying to get this information from different chairmen, but somehow or other the information is not to be had.

Mr. MADDEN. The total for the Architect of the Capitol for this current fiscal year was $802,024. That embraces the Office Buildings, power plant, and everything connected with it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was trying to get some idea of the amount of the appropriation needed for the upkeep of the Capitol proper, regardless of employees; just its upkeep.

Mr. MADDEN. It is hard to give that without going into a lot of calculation. I would be glad to put it in the RECORD.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The figures suggested did include empleyees, of course?

Mr. MADDEN. Everything-coal, light, heat, and everything. Mr. STAFFORD. For what is the $17,000 to be used?

Mr. MADDEN. It has already been used. It was used for the purpose of extending the power plant of the Botanic Garden and is a deficiency

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the item on the same page, lines

Mr. MADDEN. No; this money is appropriated for putting in the new floors; changing the floors.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any other agency, other than the Committee on Appropriations, to supervise the accounts of the Architect of the Capitol?

Mr. MADDEN. They are audited by the General Accounting

Officer—every account.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

BOTANIC GARDEN.

For repairing and reconstructing the main conservatory of the Botanic Garden, including personal services, labor, materials, and all other expenses incident to such work, fiscal years 1923 and 1924, $117,635. The foregoing work shall be performed under the supervision of the Architect of the Capitol after consultation with the Director of the Botanic Garden.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. I think the House would be interested in having an explanation of what the policy of the committee is as to the reconstruction of the conservatory of the Botanic Garden. I thought that matter was in abeyance. Why should we go ahead and reconstruct the Botanic Garden on the present site if it is going ultimately to be moved to another site under the plans of the Fine Arts Commission?

Mr. MADDEN. It probably will have to be, as the present state of the existing building is such that there is great danger of its falling down and great danger of loss of life as a result of its condition. It is over 50 years old. I believe it was

Mr. STAFFORD. But if it is in that condition and we plan to put the permanent Botanic Garden at some more appropriate place, why would it not be economy to raze rather than expend $117,000 on its reconstruction, which virtually means a new conservatory?

The Botanic Garden has been settled here Mr. MADDEN. as a fixed fact by act of Congress. While the hothouses exist they ought to be kept in a state of repair, and that is what this appropriation is for.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is not only for repair but for reconstruction—$117,000. That ought to be sufficient to provide a new conservatory. Is not that the purpose of it?

Mr. MADDEN. Last year Congress passed an act adding several acres to this site.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman refers to the shoestring tract of land leading down through the colored district.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know what kind of a district it leads through.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a shoestring tract leading through the colored district to the river.

Mr. MADDEN. I went all over it, and they are building new conservatories on it, and this particular conservatory has in it plants that are said to be valued at over $1,000,000. Their care and preservation seem to be of great importance. It seems to me, unless we want to take the risk of somebody who is obliged to work there being injured, or some one of the public who enters the building being injured, that this money ought to be expended.

Now it may be that the Botanic Garden will have to be removed some of these days. It will have to be if we build the esplanade that we contemplate building in the future. that will take place I do not know. I have no interest in the matter further than to call the attention of Congress to the importance and the necessity of spending money as wisely as we can to preserve the property that does exist, and to prevent danger to life and limb.

We have had a special examination made of the building. At my request the Architect of the Capitol made a special investigation. He called in one of the leading iron construction concerns of the country to make a special examination of it. He reports that all the cast-iron supports are eaten away, and that there is danger not only of the cupola falling in, but he says the sides may cave in and somebody may be killed. I think we would be negligent if we did not suggest the appropriation and leave it to the judgment of the House to say what should be done with it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, everyone who knew, even casually, our late lamented leader, James R. Mann, knew that he took great interest in flowers. That was his diversion. In the suburbs of Chicago he had a garden on which his interest always centered at this time of the year and in April, to give inspection to that remarkable collection of peonies which he had there, where more than 2,000 varieties were displayed. He gave attention to everything that concerned the beautification of Washington. His mind was engaged as to a fitting place for the removal of the Botanic Garden. He had doubts as to the proper site for the fountain, which is there now in the center of that garden. He could not think of any appropriate place. I have forgotten now who it was he said, in the casual conversation I had with him in connection with this matter, had donated that fountain. I think it was in connection with the Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia. I suggested to him a place between the Capitol and the Library of Congress. He looked forward to the time when the Botanic Garden would be removed, and his hope was to have it removed to a fitting place, and not have it remain in the cramped quarters that it now occupies. He had in mind its development into a real arboretum.

But here we are going ahead, at the request of the superintendent of the Botanic Garden, and reconstructing the conservatory, and virtually having the garden fixed there, when everybody knows that with the establishment of monuments there that garden will have to be removed to some more appropriate place. I do not think it wise to expend $117,000 on it for construction purposes,

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman said we were going to remove it. Does the gentleman know that to remove it would benefit hobody, whereas now it benefits everybody who comes to Washington?

Mr. STAFFORD. Anybody who has any real love of flowers and plants would go out to Rock Creek Park, just as they go out there to see the animals at the Zoo.

Mr. BLANTON. They have not the time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Thousands and thousands of people visit the Zoo. This place down here has outlived its location.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. If the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is correct, that it is a menace to life as it is, we should either make it safe or tear it down.

Mr. STAFFORD. We should raze it. It should not be allowed to remain in the present place.

Mr. BEGG. What would you do with the plants? Mr. STAFFORD. We have in Washington, under three different officers of the Government, several places where existing conservatories can house the plants until a new site is selected. Mr. BLANTON. When the gentleman gets back here we will see that he has flowers furnished him. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I look upon this as a matter of extreme importance not only to the city of Washington but also to the whole country, because the city of Washington is the pride of the whole country. It is the capital of incomparably the greatest Nation the world has ever seen, and it ought to be a model municipality. This Botanic Garden ought to be moved from its present location, and with the permission of the committee I will give my reasons for that statement.

When George Washington asked L'Enfant, who had been on his staff in the Revolutionary War, to make a plan for the Capital City, he brought in a plan which is conceded to be the very finest ever afforded for the building of a city. [Applause.] Washington is the only city that before any building began had a complete plan laid out for it in a wilderness. Paris, London, Rome, Vienna, all the other great capitals of the world are the growth of centuries, and the governmental features and buildings are only incidental. Those cities were not laid out for capitals, but Washington was laid out in the very beginning for the capital of a nation. When this plan was first presented it was denounced and ridiculed in various newspapers, and several critical statesmen exclaimed, "Look at the great city of New York! It does not need nor has it such streets as are provided for the unborn Capital City." But George Washington said "That must be the plan"; and although when he had passed away its enemies continued to fight it very hard, Jefferson insisted that it must remain the plan. Since that time there have been various attempts to do away with some of its most vital features, and one of the really great features will be destroyed, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford] indicated in his remarks a moment ago, if this building in the Botanic Garden is reconstructed at an expense of $117,000 on that site. I ask your indulgence while I give my reasons for saying that. As you know, Mr. Chairman, the original plan provided for a beautiful mall from the Capitol to the Potomac River.

That was to be a park. It is now almost all of it a park. Along in the seventies permission was given to the Pennsylvania Railroad to run a track across the Mall at Sixth Street for the purpose of accommodating the crowds that came to attend a presidential inaugural. In that way the Pennsylvania Railroad obtained entrance to the Mall, and had the road remained there it would have forever destroyed the Mall as a park as Washington and Jefferson intended it to be. It took a long time to get that railroad and its station and tracks away from there and before this was accomplished the railroad company succeeded in getting from Congress a law which gave them 14 additional acres in the Mall on which to put more tracks and train sheds, and acres of cars and smoking locomo-tives. Finally, in 1901, the Fine Arts Commission succeeded, by the aid of President McKinley and Mr. Cassatt, the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad system, in removing the Pennsylvania Railroad from the Mall. A bargain was made which resulted in the location of the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Baltimore & Ohio in the Union Station, one of the most convenient and beautiful railroad stations in the world. That, in brief, is the history of the encroachment of the railroad upon the Mall and of its final removal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask for five minutes more. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I thank the committee. Now, what was that Fine Arts Commission of 1901? It was a commission comprising some of the most distinguished architects and artists in the world. One of these was Burnham, who made the plan for Chicago, which will ultimately result in the great beautification of that wonderful city. He also made the plans for various other cities in this country and for Manila. He worked for the Government of the United States for nothing, out of a pure desire to help beautify and in every way improve Washington as the National Capital. With him was associated Mr. McKim, of McKim, Meade & White, one of the foremost architects of the world. Another member of that commission was Augustus Saint Gaudens, now dead, then the first of American sculptors. He worked for the Government for nothing. Another member of that commission was Frederick Law Olmsted, recognized as the foremost landscape architect. He also worked for the Government for nothing. Why did these famous men do this? Not one of them owned an inch of real estate in this town. They did all this only from the desire to see the city made worthy to be the Capital of the Republic. Their plan was simply an extension and elaboration of the L'Enfant plan. All of the main features of the L'Enfant plan were retained. And now let me invite your attention to the great feature in

It provided for an open avenue 300 or more feet wide from the Capitol to the Potomac; and as the visitor should stand upon the terrace of the Capitol and look down that tree-bordered avenue to the river he would see within it only the towering shaft to George Washington and the magnificent memorial to Abraham Lincoln. Beyond was to be the memorial bridge to Arlington, the home of Lee, where sleep the soldier dead. The Capitol, Washington, Lincoln, the Memorial Bridge, Arlington, the home of Lee! It is a superb, glorious, conception. When carried out, as it easily can be, no other city will have, no other city in the world ever can have, an avenue that will mean so much to lovers of liberty.

Now in the Mall to-day are temporary structures which cover many acres of ground. They are flimsy and soon to be torn down. When these are taken away there will be many acres of this great 400-foot strip all leveled and ready. The Lincoln Memorial is in place. The great reflecting mirror lagoon is in place. The Washington shaft is there for countless ries; and, to make it easy to complete the avenue, all that is necessary is to remove the Botanic Garden and make that space into what the plan contemplates, the most beautiful square of its size in the world-Union Square. That square will do more to improve this end of Pennsylvania Avenue than could any other possible improvement; and there is nothing more unworthy of the city of Washington than are the tumble-down structures now on some portions of Pennsylvania Avenue, especially the portion near the Capitol.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Chinatown.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why, gentlemen, you very rarely have a constituent come here who does not say to you that Pennsylvania Avenue is unworthy of this Capital City. see bows of acquiesence by Members before me.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask for five minutes more and then I am through.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Gentleman, I again thank you for your courtesy. We passed a law not a great while ago setting aside a number of acres across the street beginning at Maryland Avenue and running south, for the express purpose of a Botanic Garden. The Government ought to have a botanical garden in keeping with botanical gardens in other parts of the world. The Botanic Garden to-day is destroyed for its legitimate purpose. It never was half large enough. The Grant Monument is there, in accordance with the plan. Who put it there? A commission consisting of Elihu Root, William H. Who put it Taft, Gen. Granville M. Dodge, an illustrious Union soldier, and other distinguished men. Pennsylvania has located the coming statue of General Meade, the hero of Gettysburg, there, and already work is under way on its foundations. But this proposed expenditure of $117,000 to reconstruct that building will absolutely destroy the vital feature of the great plan. Here will be Grant, here will be Meade, and here an enormous conservatory

Mr. MADDEN. The conservatory is there now.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I know it; and the old structure ought to be torn down or moved across the street onto the land which has already been set aside and is being used for the Botanic Garden, running down south-30 acres of it-ample

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I ask you not to permit this reconstruction at an expense of $117,000 in that place. It will absolutely destroy the improvement called Union Square; it nue in the world. It will not cost very much to complete that

The land, as I have said, will be found leveled as soon as the temporary structures are removed. The expense will not be large. And to the millions who will come to Washington during the generations after you and I have crumbled to dust-what a lesson in patriotism it will be as they stand in that magnificent The Capitol, Washington, Lincoln, the Memorial Bridge, Arlington! Nothing else will so touch their love of country. You can read a hundred volumes, but that sight will make an incomparably greater impression than all the reading of a life-Therefore this is a vastly important matter if you love time. Washington and want it to be the Capital City that it ought

I sincerely hope that my good friend the chairman of this committee will not insist on the reconstruction at this great expense of that building in that place. I know him to be, as was said to-day, one of the ablest men in the House-indeed, I doubt if, in his particular field, he has had a superior since this Government was founded. [Applause.] He knows if he will stop to reflect-and he is accustomed to reflect-that that building ought not to be reconstructed in that place.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the item violates the rule in being legislation on an appropriation bill unauthorized by law. In supplementing that position I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the item when it was proposed to reconstruct the old Capitol Building by extending the east front several hundred feet according to plans, fathered and supported by that nestor of American politics who is about to retire from this Chamber after more than 42 years of service-our beloved Joseph G. Cannon. At that time when it was proposed to extend the east front to have it harmonize with the east fronts of the Senate and the House, it was for the reconstruction of the Capitol. That was something that had not been authorized along that plan; it was reconstruction and virtually new construction. This is for the construction of a conservatory.

This language provides for reconstructing the main conservatory. That involves a new plan, something that has not heretofore been authorized. What has been authorized heretofore is an accomplished fact in construction. If this were merely for repairs, then it might well be held that it does not violate the rule, but this is for a new project, a new public building. Suppose there is an existing public building, would anyone contend that you could provide for the reconstruction of that public building without authorization of law?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the point of order made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is well taken, and I say that with great deference, because I know the care with which the gentleman studies the rules and parliamentary procedure. The fact is, of course, that what is proposed, and that appears from the hearings, is to reconstruct upon substantially the present foundations the large building which houses these rare tropical plants. It is absolutely necessary that that be done. Of course, that is aside from the parliamentary question and yet even in the discussion of even the parliamentary question it seems necessary to state it. It is absolutely necessary to be done if these plants are to be preserved. The words "and reconstructing" might not really be necessary, except that I assume the Committee on Appropriations wanted to deal with entire frankness with the House.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman that, of course, the old foundations would be used. All of the upright iron structure has rotted away. It is very dangerous. The glass, of course, will be taken down and restored, so that it would be a matter of reconstruction, but after all it would be only repairs.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is dangerous now, as I understand it, for a person to walk through there?

Mr. LANGLEY. I would like to state, in line with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Madden] has said, that this is not the erection of a new building at all, I am entirely familiar with the conditions there, and I know that a number of pieces of iron have fallen from the roof and side of the building. 12 or 15 of them, which have been preserved by Director Hess, any one of which would have instantly killed anyone it happened to strike, and others are likely to fall at any time. Considerable of the material in the present structure, in addition to the foundations, will be used in repairs. It is obviously not subject to a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. The language of the provision is "and re-constructing," and when a building has been destroyed it is not within the power of the Committee on Appropriations, under prior rulings of the Chair, to authorize a reconstruction of it.

Mr. HUSTED. In this case the repairs are simply so extensive that it amounts to a reconstruction.

Mr. STAFFORD. If it does, then the word "repairs" should be sufficient.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The construction of which the gentleman speaks will not occur except in the course of the repairs.

Mr. STAFFORD. But if it were destroyed you could not authorize on an appropriation bill an item for its reconstruction.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But it is not destroyed. Mr. STAFFORD. Even in its present condition, whether half destroyed or 99 per cent perfect. Repairs are in order, but reconstruction is something that the Committee on Appropriations has no authority under the rules to provide for.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to cite the Chair three authorities holding that such a proposition is not subject to a point of order. I cite the Chair to decisions made by three of the most eminent and prominent parliamentarians of this House—one the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Long-worth], another the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. Hicks], and the other the late lamented, distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann]—all three of them holding that, as continuing Government work already in progress, can even go so far as to tear down and reconstruct buildings where necessary for the public good. The latest decision was when the District appropriation bill was under consideration a few days ago, in charge of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], with the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] in the chair. The Chair will remember that I made points of order to propositions where it was intended to enlarge school buildings-for instance, at the Dunbar School and at the Armstrong Manual Training School—where there was a proposal to buy additional land, with an alley in between; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hicks], in the chair, held that the present school being a project already provided for you could go so far as to buy additional land, even where there was an alley between, and you could go so far as to tear down a building and recommend to a building and reconstruct it.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.
Mr. LANGLEY. As I understand the gentleman, his point is that the word "reconstructing" is what makes this subject to a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; it makes it immune to the point of order, for it has the force and effect of "repairing." It makes it safe against the point of order, because it is a building already in existence; it is a continuing work; it is to provide repairs for something that the Congress has already provided for to maintain it. I presume the gentleman from Kentucky and myself are working to-day in double harness,

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; for the first time. Mr. BLANTON. This is not a matter of $360,000 free-seeds appropriation.

Mr. LANGLEY. No

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair wishes the precedent I referred to, I can give it to the Chair. In the Manual on page 362 we find this syllabus:

But appropriations for rent and repairs of buildings or Government roads and bridges have been admitted as in continuation of a work, although it is not in order as such to provide for a new building in place of one destroyed.

Citing Volume IV, Hinds' Precedents. The facts are these: On a diplomatic and consular appropriation bill there was an item as follows:

For the recrection of the American consular building at Tabiti, Society Islands, $5,071.45.

Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, made a point of order.

After debate the Chairman said:

Was this building completely destroyed and is this appropriation to rebuild the building, or was it simply damaged and is this item to repair it?

In reply it was stated that the foundation remained but the superstructure was rendered uninhabitable. On the other hand, it was urged that the language of the paragraph specified "recrection" and not repair.

urged that the language of the paragraph specified "reerection" and not repair.

The Chairman sustained the point of order.

Mr. Edwin Denby, of Michigan, then proposed this amendment:
For the repair of the American consular building at Tahiri, Society Islands, $5,071.45.

Mr. Mann made the point of order against the amendment.
The Chairman said:
The Chairm will have to take the language of the amendment, and unless the gentleman from Illinois desires to be heard, the Chair is ready to rule * * * The Chair would like to state to the gentleman that when the Chair ruled upon the point of order before he ruled according to the language, although the gentleman from New York said that the appropriation was "for repairs" and not "rebuilding" the building * * *. The Chair overrules the point of order.

That confirms what I stated in my former statement, that repairs are in order, but that reconstruction is not in order.

Why, it would be the most vicious ruling imaginable to hold that the Committee on Appropriations could come into the House and say, for the reconstruction of the post office at Milwaukee or Cleveland or any other city, $1,000,000, when the original building had been constructed, was a completed project. This is for safeguarding the rights of the legislative committees of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the Chair permit one other authority? When one of the Army appropriation bills was before the committee, with the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Towner in the chair, there was up a proposition for the Gov-ernment to acquire land, which afterwards became known as the Leon Springs Training Camp, as an adjunct to, but distant from Fort Sam Houston. A point of order was made against it and the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Towner] then in the chair held that same was part of a continuing work, and after considering the matter for quite a long time he rendered rather a lengthy decision holding it was in order as a continuing work, and he overruled the point of order.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will permit just a suggestion. The pending item is not to put a building in place of one that has been destroyed; that involves new construction perhaps; but here is a building that is complete and standing, and the object of the item is to take that partly to pieces, to put in new iron or steel work, then to take the same glass and reconstruct a building that is now standing. That is nothing whatever but a repair job. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford] admits that so long as it is for repairs the item is in order. The hearings will disclose, what is the fact, that this is to have the same foundation, is to contain the same glass and material; but because the iron portions have become insecure and unsafe it must partly be taken down and then put together again. It is clearly within the rule.

Mr. LANGLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I want to make this observation, that the main deterioration is in the roof of the building. There is considerable deterioration in the walls also, but the glass and much other material now in the structure can be used in the repair and reconstruction work.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the Chair will permit one brief suggestion. They might use $5,000 or $10,000 of this appropriation for what might legitimately be called repairs and then use $100,000 for reconstruction, tearing down and rebuilding, using some for repairs and the balance for tearing down and putting up another building. There is no provision that it shall be the same style of building, because the provision of this item provides that it shall be under the supervision of the Architect of the Capitol after consultation with the Director of the Botanic Gardens.

Mr. LANGLEY. I want to say it would cost $800,000 to build a new building.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The language of the paragraph contains both the words "repair" and "reonstruction." The Chair is of the opinion that the two words repair" and "reconstruction" must be considered together. construction.' The only point in the Chair's mind that could possibly prevail in the matter stated in the point of order is whether or not this is a new building. Of course—

Mr. MADDEN. Will the Chair hear me briefly?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will.

Mr. MADDEN. Last year, late in the year, it was thought by the Appropriations Committee that we could really safeguard the building by investing $5,000 in repairs, and Congress appropriated that sum in the last deficiency bill. Everybody who has examined the building since the appropriation was made said it would be wasted, and if it were used it would not accomplish the purpose. We have not used the money, and a further investigation shows that a complete rebuilding of the whole Botanic Garden would cost in the neighborhood of a million dollars. Further investigation showed that to make this conservatory of the same type of building, to use the same foundation and as much of the iron work as could be used in repair and reconstruction, to take the glass down would cost $122,000. We took the $5,000 already appropriated from the $122,000, hence the $117,000 which is to constitute the repairs which we are providing for, nothing more and nothing less.
Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman permit me further?
Mr. MADDEN. Yes.
Mr. LANGLEY. As I understand, the Budget Commission and the President recommend—both approved this amount.

fact I know. I have seen the documents.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. It is perfectly obvious that this appropriation is not for the construction of a new building. The language of the paragraph is quite plain. "For repairing and reconstructing" and it is quite apparent, in view of the facts that have been related and brought out in this discussion, that the reconstruction, in this instance, means nothing more than the putting in of necessary repairs. Chair is of the opinion that this is nothing more than repairs, perhaps on a large scale, but none the less repairs in the interest of the safety of the people who may have occasion to visit this institution. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois, did I understand him to say that we had on hand $5.000 of appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. For repairs?

Mr. MADDEN. For repairs.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. When was that appropriation made?

On one of the deficiency bills last year. Mr. MADDEN.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. On whose application? Mr. MADDEN. On the application of the director.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Hess, of the Botanic Garden?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the words "and reconstructing" and by chang-ing the amount of $117,000 to $25,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment offered by Mr. Cooper of Wisconsin: Page 4, line 22, after the word "repairing," strike out the words "and reconstructing," and in line 25 on the same page strike out "$117,635" and insert in lieu thereof "$25,000,"

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, just a word on that amendment. With the $5,000 now on hand for repairs and $25,000 additional, making $30,000, that ought to be ample to make all the repairs necessary. If this is so dangerous, it is remarkable that the director did not ask for more than $5,000 a short time ago. It is also remarkable that he has allowed, as you could have seen at any time, scores and scores of people to walk through it and around it and under it, and I have done it myself.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee rose.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But I want to call the attention of the gentleman who is about to speak to this fact: That there are gentlemen who are absolutely opposed to ever taking the Botanic Garden away. There has been a bitter battle on, and the center of it is Mr. Hess. He has a good deal of influence, and I know he exercises it. But I think that $30,000 is all that ought to be expended in repairing a building which ought not to be where it is and which, if $117,000 is expended, will result in the destruction absolutely for many, many years of the splendid plan for the beautification and improvement of Washington.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, of course might as well do nothing as to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Cooper]. If I understand clearly the purpose that lies behind the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, it is to bring about a situation in which the Botanic Garden shall be removed from its present site. Of course, you might as well appropriate nothing as to appropriate $25,000. The matter has been carefully examined into, as I understand it, by the Committee on Appropriations. The hearings so disclose; at least, they were satisfactory to me when I went over them; and this sum, $117,000, is the sum that is necessary to put the building in the condition that it should be put in.

Now, if it is going to come down to the question of whether you are going to remove the Botanic Garden from its present site or not, the gentleman's proper amendment would be to move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized. Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who have been fighting this propaganda that has been going on for three years-to move the Botanic Garden-and incidentally to let some people out here on the other side of nowhere unload a lot of land that is of no value on this Government at a high price.

You would hardly think that many people come here from Texas, but they do, and I rarely have had any of my constituents come here who did not want to go into this Botanic Garden. It is the first place of interest to people who love flowers. Why, just day before yesterday I took a bunch of Texas people in there to get some valuable information from Mr. Hess, and when I went in I found the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Garrett] coming out. He had been there also, indicating that he had been there for such information. It is valuable information; it is information that they can not get anywhere else concerning flowers that beautify homes in every district of this land.

I am in favor of keeping the Botanic Garden right where it is. It is accessible to every tourist who comes here. It is accessible to every constituent who comes here—rich and poor alike. There are lots of people who come here who are not able to pay $4 an hour to some of these taxicab drivers to take them around. It is impossible for us to take out those who come in our automobiles. It is not convenient for them to walk or to ride in the street cars. This present Botanic Garden is accessible to them All of them appreciate it; all of them get benefit from it,

Now they are putting in a new heating plant there, and they have probably torn down some of this old conservatory preparato installing their new heating plant. What is the use of making an inadequate appropriation for this necessity? Congress is presumed to adjourn until next December. Nine months will have to pass without a chance of getting any kind of a deficiency if they need it, and I hope our distinguished friend from Wisconsin [Mr. Coopes], who usually is in behind everything that pertains to the interest of this city and the interest of the Nation, will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. When was it that the gentleman was down there with his constituents?

Mr. BLANTON. I think it was day before yesterday. Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did anybody warn you that it was dangerous to be there?

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to the gentleman— Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Wait a minute. Answer my question. Did anybody warn you? You said you talked with him. Did anybody warn you that it was dangerous? Mr. BLANTON, Wait a minute.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman just answer that question?

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to answer the gentleman's question in my own way.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman can not answer it as it ought to be answered.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to answer it right anyway. I took my Texas constituents down there. If Mr. Hess had been there himself he would have gone with them in person, but at that time the wife of Mr. Hess was at the point of death, and he had gone away to see her. His assistant was there and I turned the Texas people over to him and he spent two hours going through that plant with them.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And the gentleman says he knew that it was dangerous and falling down and that these things were likely to knock out their brains.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think he would take them into a dangerous place?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What nonsense that is.
Mr. BLANTON. There are plenty of places beside this particular conservatory where he could take them.
Mr. STAFFORD. What?
Mr. BLANTON. I do not know. I left them with him, and they came back satisfied. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Gentlemen of the committee, I think that the gentleman from Tennessee a moment ago stated the entire situation, that if we are going to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Cooper], we might just as well decide to do nothing, because there would be nothing to that.

I regret very deeply the general attitude of Members in apparent approval and response to what was just now suggested by my friend, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Cooper], in his statement in argument against this item, in which he sees danger of retaining the conservatory where it now is, as if the Botanic Garden, as it is now and has always been located. disturbs the value of the Mall. On the other hand, it is a distinctive value to the Mall, a value that few parks in the world possess. There is not a spot in the city of Washington that is more significant from the standpoint of intrinsic value, and as a feature of beautifying the Capitol Grounds than this garden. It was properly located near the Capitol, as a part of the Capitol Grounds, at the head of the Mall. Within a very few weeks there will be flowers within these grounds representing many climes. There is no other such collection of flowering trees, not mere shrubs, but trees, the rarest in the world. In that garden, an expansion of the Capitol Grounds, with its historic and valuable botanical specimens, are collected the most valuable selections of rare flowering plants, flowering shrubs, and especially flowering trees that can be found anywhere in the same space in the world. What single item of landscape gardening for the beautifying of the National Capitol Grounds is of greater value? When you talk about that marring the beauty of the Mall, or destroying the plan of the city beautiful, as Washington has already become, I do not understand it. [Applause.] The wealth of this spot can not be replaced by mere money. It represents a hundred years of collection and It represents a hundred years of collection and growth of development. It seems to me you would go a long distance in order to find an assemblage of botanical richness, both from the standpoint of economic and scientific values as are here in the Capitol Grounds, a collection that can not be duplicated if once it is ever destroyed.

Now, just a word about this particular conservatory, which the committee proposes to repair and for which this item is recommended. I can see that in a sense that building might mar the artistic effect of the plan which locates the grounds for different purposes from that originally planned. The Capitol Grounds proper should be free from historic monuments. great pile of marble, housing the Government proper, should be undisturbed by other structures, it is true. Even I doubt the taste that located the monument that stands near by. The conservatory structure may be objectionable, because it would appear to be a building of some commercial value. However, it is not primarily commercial but, as in these cases, is more specifically scientific and historic. The building should be so reconstructed as to protect the rare and valuable collection that could not be replaced for a million dollars, plants that are now protected in that conservatory representing the widest range for the study of tropical flora and of immense value to the Nation. They can not be removed. There are plants there over 100 years old. They are planted not in pots but in the ground, and many are surrounded by a protection of cement. The roots necessarily have gone down in the years of growth so deeply and so intermingled that there is no possibility of removing them and at the same time preserving them. Here is a collection, I want to repeat to my colleagues, that you could not replace for a million dollars, collected in a hundred years, representing the most careful research in this particular field; and yet we speak of it lightly, as if the space is wasted, the Capitol Grounds neglected and marred, and the entire collection removed, as if you want to abate it as a nuisance. I do not understand that attitude.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Yes. Mr. FESS.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did the gentleman say there are plants there that have been there a hundred years? Why, the Botanic Garden is not half as old as that.

There are plants there over a hundred years old. I did not say they had been in one spot over a hundred years.

Mr. LANGLEY. I know one that is nearly 104 years old.

Mr. FESS. I am stating what I know. Some of these plants are over 100 years old. I do not want that statement questioned. You can not remove them; and my concern is the pro-tection of what can not be replaced. To suggest that this rare, tioned. rich spot—a part of the Capitol Grounds—filled with specimens of valuable beauty brought from the ends of the earth is a blot upon the parking beauty of the Mall here is a peculiar suggestion. My hope is that nothing may be done to lessen the important value of that collection which could not be replaced under any circumstances. [Applause.] Just west of these grounds, in a space now occupied by temporary buildings, we saw valuable trees which had stood for years cut down in spite of the specific promise made us from the floor of the House that they would not be disturbed.

To-day the space is an open plot of ground. Ever since I have been in Congress agitation is on to abandon the garden space. There, where trees planted by Lincoln, by Grant, Booth, and Barrett, and other historic characters, the cedar of Lebanon from the Holy Land, the oak from the grave of Confucius—all will meet a like fate of the others. If it is a question of removing the garden, that ought to be discussed fully and we should know what we are doing. But I do not understand that that is what the chairman of the committee has in mind at all. If you should undertake to build a new conservatory, to do with the plants as we would hope to do, it would take a great deal more than $117,000. would take a great deal more than $117,000. [Applause.]

I do not object to the plan of expanding the garden. went into that matter a year ago when we enlarged the area. I am for that improvement. Neither am I committed against the proposal of the Fine Arts Commission to ultimately develop a proper arboratum. I am strongly in favor of such move-ment in the Capital. As to the Mount Hamilton expansion, I am open to conviction. I am not prejudiced against the proposal and am willing to go into the matter in detail. But I am uncompromisingly opposed to the plan of destroying the inestimable value of the collection within the brick walls for no other reason than here given, that growing trees, flowering and ornamental trees, rich in beauty and historic significance, plants and shrubs housed within glass structures, interferes with a plan to surround the Capitol with monuments. Whether the monuments are properly placed I do not say, but I know that a botanical collection of 100 years will not mar the beauty of the Capitol Grounds.

The glass structures are old and out of repair. We have been told that it is dangerous. Such a building, adapted to the use of the public, through which pass daily hundreds of people coming to the Capitol, must not be allowed to endanger the lives of those who enter it. That could not be excused upon any ground by this great, rich country. I am hopeful that these buildings in their repair may be put in modern condition, suitable to the importance of their contents and adapted to the place where located.

As those of us who frequently go through the garden all know that the main conservatory has two wings extending out east and west; at the end of each wing is an octagon house. The reason for this division is that plants require different temperatures.

The educational feature of the conservatory lies mainly in its collection of plants, expressed in the layout of the planting, showing their characteristics, similar to their native habitat. The growing, feeding, flowering, and pruning are carefully planned and executed, since all plants are labeled as in their geographical distribution and economical value.

Each of these houses has, as near as can be arranged, a different temperature, corresponding to the tropical and subtropical regions. Some of the plants are planted in the soil. Needs of soil to bring out a landscape effect characteristic in tropical regions require particular attention. Some are placed in pots to be rearranged periodically.

The money value of these collections could not very well be estimated; so many plants are rare and others are of such size that no commercial value could be attached.

Owing to the interest Members of the House have in these collections, I will append a list of some of the more important specimens which I had requested for another purpose.

This partial list will indicate why I am so intensely concerned when I hear careless and unguarded, if not intentional, statements of Members tending to depreciate the inestimable value of this beauty spot near the Capitol Building:

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LUCE. Previous Congresses have seen fit to give the control of the Botanic Garden to the Committee on the Library. I want in all courtesy to suggest that the orderly processes of action here will be smoothed and made more harmonious if under such conditions the committee which has the official responsibility for this problem might at least have some knowledge of the proposals made by other committees. It was only by accident that I entered the door when this matter was under consideration and for the first time as a member of the Library Committee was informed of this indirect proposal to keep the Botanic Garden where it is for an indefinite time.

keep the Botanic Garden where it is for an indefinite time.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. If this matter was to go to any other committee except the Committee on Appropriations, it would not be the Library Committee but to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. This is a matter of construction.

Mr. LUCE. If that be the case, we have three committees with overlapping interests in the subject. I take no pride in the matter as a member of the Committee on the Library, but the matter as a member of the Committee on the Library, but desire to suggest that if gentlemen do not wish to consult the Committee on the Library as to matters within its constrict the might be advantageous to take away from the Committee on the Library the jurisdiction. If the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds would better control, well and good; I doubt if should raise any objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I will. Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am in sympathy with the gentleman in maintaining the jurisdiction of committees, but only the Committee on Appropriations could have jurisdiction of this matter.

Mr. LUCE. The Committee on the Library has already been asked, since my membership of it, to consider a bill relating to a site for the Botanic Garden.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly, the gentleman's committee would have jurisdiction of that, but I am speaking of appropriations.

appropriations.

Mr. LUCE. Technically the gentleman from Tennessee is correct, but this is a proposal to accomplish by indirection what the Committee on the Library should accomplish directly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What does the gentleman mean—keeping the Botanical Garden where it is?

Mr. LUCE. The retention of the garden where it is, because it would be long out of the question after you had spent $125,000 here for Congress to take up the problem of a new site for the Botanical Garden.

Will the gentleman yield? Mr. BLANTON.

Mr. LUCE. Yes.
Mr. BLANTON. We have just spent $40,000 for a heating plant there, or at least we have provided for the expenditure of that amount.

Mr. LANGLEY. And the plant is complete.
Mr. BLANTON. It is about completed for that very conservatory. Mr. LUCE.

Mr. LUCE. That is in essence a question of maintenance. Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection. Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin. The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected. Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise. The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Mc-Arthur, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 14408 and had come to no resolution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request made earlier this morning to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the Supreme Court decisions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on decisions of the Supreme Court. Is there objection? There was no objection.

DECISIONS OF THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, last summer and fall there was a renewed attack on the Supreme Court of the United States from various quarters and vigorous demands for a curtailment of the powers of that tribunal. These attacks centered against this court's exercise of power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional and void because such acts, in the opinion of a majority of the Supreme Court, were in violation of some provision of the Constitution of the United States.

That the Supreme Court had the power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional was denied by a few of the ablest statesmen who were prominent in framing the Constitution and establishing the Republic. On the other hand, during the early days of the Republic the Supreme Court claimed this power and has exercised this power from that time to this. Although constitutional amendments have been proposed and bills have been introduced in Congress from time to time to deprive the Supreme Court of this power or to curtail the exercise of this power by the Supreme Court, none ever received serious consideration by the Congress.

A little over 10 years ago there was a widespread and vigorous campaign in this country for the enactment of legislation to give the people the right to recall judicial decisions. The life of this campaign did not survive the second sober thought of the American people. The demand last year was to deprive the Supreme Court, by a constitutional amendment, of the power of final determination on the constitutionality of acts of Congress. The purpose of the suggested amendment was to give vitality to an act of Congress declared unconstitutional and void by the Supreme Court upon its repassage by a majority of both Houses of Congress. This proposal would make Congress the final arbiter of the constitutionality of its own acts. The Senator who suggested the amendment in a public address has to this day offered no resolution in Congress for such a change in our fundamental law.

It is evident to clothe Congress with the power to pass on the constitutionality of its own acts would require a change by amendment to the Federal Constitution. To give Congress this power would be a radical departure from our present constitutional government. In order to preserve our present system of constitutional government, the power to pass on the constitutionality of the acts of Congress must be vested in some body or tribunal outside of and independent of Congress.

It is not my purpose at this time, Mr. Speaker, to enumerate and discuss the powers conferred by the Constitution on the Federal Government and the powers and rights reserved under that Constitution to the people of the several States. The Federal Government is a government of limited and carefully defined powers, delegated to it by the Constitution, and has no powers except those so delegated. All other powers not so delegated by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

Neither shall I take the time to give the reasons or the necessity, in order to preserve our present system of Federal and State Governments, for empowering the Supreme Court to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional and vold, which are in violation of provisions of the Federal Constitution, and which threaten the integrity or security of either Nation or State, or both, or which violate certain fundamental and sacred rights of life or property guaranteed to the people by the Constitution.

Last summer and fall when the Supreme Court was under fire of criticism there were statements in the press calculated to lead people to believe that that tribunal kept itself busy handing down decisions declaring congressional acts to be unconstitu-tional. Early last fall I endeavored to get a list of all the Supreme Court cases which hold acts of Congress unconstitutional, but such a list was nowhere to be found. I called upon the legislative reference service of the Library of Congress for help, and that service put several of its experts to the task of going through all the Supreme Court reports for the decisions holding acts of Congress unconstitutional. Such a list was finally completed and furnished me on October 12, 1922, which I shall have printed in the RECORD.

This list contains 48 decisions by the Supreme Court declaring acts of Congress unconstitutional and void since the foundation of our Government, or on an average of one such decision in a little less than three years. It is only fair to observe that such decisions have been more frequent in the late years. For the first 50 years of our Government there were very few such decisions.

The real question to keep in mind is not how often the Supreme Court has declared acts of Congress unconstitutional, but how often the Congress has enacted legislation in violation of plain provisions of the Constitution. Whenever Congress exceeds its power in this regard, it is the plain duty of the Supreme Court to declare such acts unconstitutional and void. However, such a duty should be performed with great caution. The presumption in every case should be in favor of the validity of the act of Congress until the violation of the Constitution is proved beyond all reasonable doubt.

About two weeks ago this same reference service furnished me with a list of the United States Supreme Court decisions declaring acts of State legislatures unconstitutional. I shall also have this list printed in the RECORD. I am sure these lists of decisions will be of especial interest to the members of the bar of the country and to students of government generally.

5-TO-4 DECISIONS

A number of very important decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States declaring acts of Congress unconstitutional have been by a vote of 5 to 4. There are nine Justices voted to declare the act unconstitutional and four against. It is this class of decisions that has been the chief cause of attacks and storms of protest against the Supreme Court.

The far-reaching effect of one vote in declaring acts of Congress unconstitutional has led to a persistent demand for legislation requiring more than a bare majority of the Supreme Court to pass on so important and vital an issue as the constitutionality of an act of Congress. To bring about this result the following bill is now pending before Congress:

A bill providing the number of judges which shall concur in holding an act of Congress unconstitutional.

Be it enacted, etc., That in all suits now pending, or which may hereafter be pending, in the Supreme Court of the United States, except cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, where is drawn in question an act of Congress on the ground of repugnancy to the Constitution of the United States, at least seven members of the court shall concur before pronouncing said law unconstitutional.

The authority for the constitutionality and validity of such legislation is based on the following constitutional provision:

In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction; in all other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

In my opinion there is some merit to the proposed legislation. No act of Congress should be declared unconstitutional and void unless it is very clear that such act is in violation of the Constitution, and such violation should be clear to the minds of more than a bare majority of the court. Such legislation would be in line with the words of Chief Justice Marshall in Fletcher v. Peck (6 Cranch, 87-128). He says:

The question whether a law be void for its repugnancy to the Constitution is at all times a question of much delicacy, which ought seldom, if ever, to be decided in the affirmative in a doubtful case. It is not on slight implication and vague conjecture that the legislature is to be pronounced to have transcended its powers and its acts to be considered as void.

The following are some of the well-known 5-to-4 decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States holding legislation repugnant to the Constitution :

Slaughterhouse cases (16 Wall. 36).
Virginia coupon cases (114 U. S. 269).
Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (income-tax cases) (157 U. S. 429; 158 U. S. 601).
Fairbanks v. United States (181 U. S. 283).
Hammer v. Dagenhart (247 U. S. 251).
Eisner v. Macomber (252 U. S. 189).
Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Stewart (253 U. S. 149).
Newberry v. United States (256 U. S. 232). THE NEWBERRY CASE.

The Newberry case attracted much popular attention and criticism about a year ago, and is a striking example of a 5-to-4 decision by the Supreme Court declaring an act of Congress unconstitutional and void. The act under consideration was the Federal corrupt practices act limiting the expenditures of a candidate for Representative in Congress or for Senator of the United States in procuring his nomination. Four justices held squarely that Congress did not have the power under Article I, section 4, of the Constitution to enact such legislation as applied to a candidate for Senator of the United States. Four justices, led by Chief Justice White, held squarely that Congress had such power. The ninth justice finally tipped the scales in favor of the unconstitutionality of the act in a four-line opinion found at the end of the majority opinion and reads as follows:

Mr. Justice McKenna concurs in this opinion as applied to the statute under consideration which was enacted prior to the seventeenth amendment; but he reserves the question of the power of Congress under the amendment.

The big question in this case was: Has Congress the power under Article I, section 4, of the Constitution to enact the legislation under consideration in so far as it applied to primary elections? On this question eight justices stood 4 to 4. Mr. Justice McKenna's attitude left this question suspended in the air undecided. He voted with the majority to declare the act unconstitutional but not on the ground that Congress did not have the power under said section of the Constitution to enact the legislation under consideration. A case like this illustrates what Chief Justice Marshall seemed to have in his mind when he made the statement heretofore quoted wherein he refers to "a doubtful case" and that legislation should not be pronounced unconstitutional "on slight implication and vague conjecture.

The decision of the Supreme Court in the Newberry case was carefully reviewed in an opinion by the law committee of the National Republican congressional committee, consisting of Representatives Leatherwood, of Utah, Williamson, of South Dakota, and myself, rendered March 21, 1922. On this point the opinion is worthy of a place in the Congressional Record, and I submit it here for that purpose: The opinion follows:

Hon. SIMEON D. FESS,
Chairman National Republican Congressional Committee,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FESS: The law committee of the national Republican congressional committee had submitted to it the following question: "Under existing Federal law is a candidate for Representative in Congress at a primary election required to file sworn statements of his primary campaign expenditures with the Clerk of the House of Representatives?"

The Federal corrupt practices act (act of June 25, 1910, ch. 392, 36 Stat. 822; amended by act of August 19, 1911, ch. 33, 37 Stat. 25, 28) limits the amount of money that may be given, contributed, expended, used, or promised, or caused to be given, contributed, expended, used, or promised by a candidate for Representative in Congress or for Senator of the United States in procuring his nomination and election to a sum not in excess of the amount he may lawfully give, contribute, expend, or promise under the laws of the State of his residence, with a proviso that in the case of a candidate for Representative the amount shall not exceed $5,000, and in the case of a candidate for Senator shall not exceed $5,000, and in the case of a candidate for Senator shall not exceed $5,000, and in the case of a candidate for Representative in Congress or for Senator of the United States of expenditures incurred both in the primary election and in the general election.

If Congress has the power to enact such legislation, it is based on the following constitutional provisions:

"Article I. Section I. All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors of tach State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. * * *"

Section 3 is superseded by the seventeenth amendment, which provides:

Section 3 is superseded by the seventeenth amendment, which provides

"Article XVII. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, " * The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. * * *

"Section 4. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

or after such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

"Section 5. Each House shall be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.

The power of Congress to enact legislation regulating primary elections was never decided by the Supreme Court until in the case of Truman H. Newberry et al., plaintiffs in error, v. the United States of America. This case was decided by the Supreme Court May 2, 1921.

In the Newberry case the plaintiffs in error were found cultured.

In the Newberry case the plaintiffs in error were found guilty of conspiracy to violate section 8 of the act of June 25, 1910, as amended by the act of August 19, 1911, in the Federal district court of Michigan.

In the Newberry case the plantitus in error were found guilty of conspiracy to violate section 8 of the act of June 25, 1910, as amended by the act of August 19, 1911, in the Federal district court of Michigan.

This case was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States on the 2d day of May, 1921, on the ground that the grant of power on Congress to regulate the "manner of holding elections" under Article I, section 4, of the Constitution did not bestow on Congress the authority to control party primaries or conventions for designating candidates. That is, the majority of the court seem to hold that the power to regulate the "manner of holding elections" is limited to general elections and that there is no power to regulate the manner of holding primary elections or party conventions.

If there were nothing to consider in this case, except the conclusion of the majority of the court, we would have no hesitancy in answering in the negative the question submitted to us. This is a five-to-four decision. Mr. Justice McReynolds wrote the opinion of the majority. In this opinion Mr. Justice McKenna concurred with a reservation as follows: "Mr. Justice McKenna concurred with a green to the seventeenth amendment; but he reserves the question of the power of Congress under that amendment."

What would have been Mr. Justice McKenna's conclusion if the seventeenth amendment had been adopted prior to the enactment of the corrupt practices act and amendments thereto? Furthermore, the plaintiff in error—Newberry—was a candidate for the Senate and the seventeenth amendment applies only to Senators, and Mr. Justice McKenna "concurs in this opinian as applied to the statute under consideration, which was enacted prior to the seventeenth amendment applies only to Senators, and Mr. Justice McKenna "concurs in this opinian as applied to the statute under consideration, which was enacted prior to the seventeenth amendment."

As the seventeenth amendment applies on the House of Representative in Congress at a primary election.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I submit for printing in the Record a letter from H. H. B. Meyer, chief bibliographer, in charge of the Legislative Reference Service, together with the lists of Supreme Court cases referred to in the course of my remarks:

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS, Washington, October 12, 1922.

Hon. C. WILLIAM RAMSEYER, Bloomfield, Iowa.

DEAR SIR: In further response to your request of September 23 for a list of all acts of Congress declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, I forward herewith a typewritten list of "United States Supreme Court decisions declaring Federal legislation unconstitutional." This list was prepared with great care and checked up with other existing lists, and I have every reason to believe that it is as complete as can be made excepting for the last few months, as the note at the end of the manuscript explains. We shall, however, in the future make it a point to keep this information corrected as near up to date as the published reports permit.

We are preparing a similar list covering the United States Supreme Court decisions declaring State legislation unconstitutional. Should you be interested I should be glad to send you a copy of the list when it is completed. This is a far more difficult and voluminous undertaking, and with our present limited staff it may not be completed for some time.

Very respectfully,

H. H. B. MEYER,
Chief Bibliographer,
in charge of Legislative Reference Service.

Ex parte Garland (4 Wall. 333). Act of January 24, 1865 (13 Stat. 424). The admitted power of Congress to prescribe qualifications for the office of attorney and counselor in the Federal courts can not be exercised as a means for the infliction of punishment for the past conduct of such officers against the inhibition of the Constitution.

Reichart v. Felps (6 Wall. 160). This has been classed as a decision declaring a Federal act unconstitutional. It determined the validity of certain patents and the power of the board issuing them, but the constitutional element or congressional act involved is difficult to determine.

The Alicia (7 Wall. 571). Act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 311). This court can not acquire jurisdiction of a cause * * * though such transfer be authorized by the express provision of an act of Congress. The making of notes or bills of credit a legal tender in payment of precising debts is not a means appropriate, plainly adapted, or really calculated to carry into effect any express power vested in Congress, is inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution, and is prohibited by the Constitution. United States e. Dewitt (9 Wall. 41). Act of March 2, 1867 (14 State) are also as a virtual denial of any power to interfere with the internal trade and business of the separate States.

The Justices v. Murray (8 Wall. 274). Act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 755). United States v. Klein (13 Wall. 128). Act of July 12, 1870 (16 Stat. 283). Now it is clear that the legislature can not change a law. United States v. Raliroad Co. (17 Wall. 322). Act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 284). A municipal recrease of the common for congress, under the Constitution of the United States v. Raliroad Co. (17 Wall. 322). Act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 284). Counselman v. Hitchcock (142 U. S. 547; R. S. 860). In view of the constitutional provision, a statutory enactment, to be valid must afford absolute immunity against future prosecution for the offense to which the question relates.

Monogahela Navigation Co. v. United States (148 U. S. 312). Act of August 11, 1888 (25 Stat. 411). It does not rest with the public, taking the property, through Congress or the legislature, its representative, to say what compensation shall be paid, or even what shall be the rule of compensation.

Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S. 429). Act of August 27, 1894 (28 Stat. 553). A tax on the rents or income of real estate is a direct tax, within the meaning of that term as used in the Constitution of the United States. A tax upon income derived from the interest of bonds issued by a municipal corporation is a tax upon the power of the State and its instrumentalities to borrow money and is consequently repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

Pollock v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Co. (Rehearing, 158 U. S. 601). Act of August 27, 1894 (28 Stat. 553). The tax imposed by * * the act of 1894, so far as it falls on the income of real estate and of personal property, being a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution, and therefore unconstitutional and void because not apportioned according to representation, constituting one entire scheme of taxation, are necessarily invalid.

When Congress sees fit to further promote such a policy by subjecting the persons of such aliens to infamous punishment at hard labor or by confiscating their property, such legislation, to be valid, must provide for a judicial trial to establish the guilt of the accused.

Alrhanks v. United States (181 U. S. 283). Act of June 13, 1898 (400 Stat. 451). A stamp tax on a foreign bill of lading, in substance and effect, equivalent to a tax on the articles included in that bill of lading, and therefore is a tax or duty on exports and therefore in conflict with Article I, section 9, of the Constitution of the United States. Junes v. Bowman (190 U. S. 127; R. S. 5507). That amendment 15 relates solely to action by the United States or by any State and does power in respect to elections of representatives to Congress, section 5507 can not be sustained under such general power, because Congress did not act in the exercise of such power.

Matter of Heff (197 U. S. 488). Act of January 30, 1897 (28 Stat. 506). Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Stewart (253 U. S. 149). Act of October 6, 1917. 40 Stat. 395. The attempted amendment [making State law applicable in maritime cases] is unconstitutional as being a delegation of the legislative power of Congress and as defeating the purpose of the Constitution respecting the harmony and uniformity of the maritime law.

Evans v. Gore (253 U. S. 245). Act of February 24, 1919. 40 Stat. 1062. A tax upon the net income of a United States district judge * * operates to diminish his compensation in violation of the Constitution.

United States v. Cohen Grocery Co. (255 U. S. 81). Act of August 10, 1917. 40 Stat. 276. A provision imposing penalty for making "any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries" is repugnant to the fifth and sixth amendments to the Constitution. Newberry v. United States (256 U. S. 232). Act of June 25, 1910. 36 Stat. 822. Federal regulation of expenditures in election of Members of Congress is a usurpation of State rights.

Note.—This report covers reports to 257 U. S. 311 only. Attention is called to the opinions reported May 15, 1922, Bailey v. Drexler Furniture Co. (child labor tax case). and Hill v. Wallace, but no cases subsequent to December 12, 1921, are included, as the material is not available in form to check for omissions.

MINORITY VIEWS, FISCAL RELATIONS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA (H. DOC. NO. 603).

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, from the minority of the Special Joint Select Committee appointed under the act of June 29, 1922, on the fiscal relations of the District of Columbia and the United States, I ask unanimous consent to submit minority views and have them printed in the RECORD in S-point type; also, in that connection, that the minutes of the meeting of January 20, 1923, together with these minority views, be also printed as a public document and distributed through the folding room, there being 1,500 extra copies so printed for the convenience of the Senate and the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to file minority views and have them printed in the Record in 8-point type, and to have them printed also as a public document together with the minutes of the meeting referred to, 1,500 extra copies being printed. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how many copies are for the House and how many for the Senate?

Mr. EVANS. I did not make any reservation as to the distribution. I made the same request with reference to this that was made with reference to the majority report of the

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does this have to be acted upon in the other body?

Mr. EVANS. No. The action will be presented by a bill, which has been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and also by amendment to be presented to the District of Columbia appropriations bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. My impression is that the expenditure is limited to $500, and the distribution is in the regular way, proportionately between both branches, and it becomes a public document.

Mr. SISSON. That is true if it takes the regular course, but in view of the fact that he asks for 1,500 extra copies to be printed, I think there would be a statement as to how many are to go to the Senate and how many to the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The experience of the committee is that after the proportionate distribution the bulk should go where the public can get them.

Mr. SISSON. I want to say that if it had not been for special request of the 1,500 I should not have made any statement about it at all, because they would have been distributed under the rule.

Mr. EVANS. Gentlemen will find on page 3051, I think, of the Record, exactly the same request with reference to the other

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

The minority views are as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The minority views of your committee appointed pursuant to the act of Congress approved June 29, 1922, to inquire into the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the United

The undersigned is unable to agree with the findings and conclusions of the majority of the committee for the following reasons

(1) The construction of the act raising the committee as made by the majority report is erroneous, and the same objection lies as to the construction or effect of other acts bearing upon or affecting the matter investigated by the committee.

(2) The investigation made by the committee has covered neither the period nor the extent that Congress directed.

(3) The finding by the majority of a balance or surplus of $4,438,154,92 as due to the District of Columbia is not supported by facts or law.

The language of the act under which the committee was created is clear and positive in its authorization and directions. There is, as to the points upon which the majority of the committee and the writer differ, no ambiguity in the language of the act.

The purpose Congress had in creating the joint select committee was to discover and report to Congress all facts bearing on the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia, hereinafter called the District, and the United States, hereinafter called the Government, in order that Congress might be able to determine the exact state of such fiscal relations.

Based on the information so to be gathered, the committee was to report the surplus, if any, in favor of the District. The reason for this inquiry was a claim that there was approximately $5,500,000 held by the Government belonging to the This claim was questioned, and to settle this dispute and determine what, if any, surplus existed was the primary purpose in view. The alleged surplus reported by the majority of the committee is not based on such facts or information so gathered, because not all of such facts or information was gathered or searched for. In addition it was desired to have fixed accurately and authoritatively the amounts contributed by the District and the Government, respectively, for "maintaining, upbuilding, or beautifying said District, or for the purpose of conducting its governmental activities and agencies or for the furnishing of conveniences, comforts, and necessities to the people of said District." This direction of Congress has been ignored or so performed as to amount to a disregard of the congressional mandate.

The construction of the act raising the committee as made by the majority is erroneous, and the same objection lies to the construction of other acts bearing upon or affecting the investigations by the committee.

The act "authorizes and directs" inquiry into all matters pertaining to the fiscal relations between the District and the Government since July 1, 1874.

First, there is no question but that the act is mandatory. It is not left to the choice or desire of the committee or a majority of the committee to determine whether it is best or proper or just to go into the subject matter presented for inquiry, and the act is equally specific as to the extent. It covers all matters" pertaining to the fiscal relations July 1, 1874.

The proper consideration of the questions presented by the majority report and in the construction of the act of June 29, 1922, requires an inquiry into the relations existing between the District and the Government. The primary cause for the existence of the District is a seat for the National Capital. The existence of the city as a place of residence or business is purely incidental to its existence as the Capital.

The right of suffrage or the right of representation in any legislative body in the sense that it exists in a State, county, or municipality does not exist here. Congress has the power and, so far as the Capital is concerned, the right to utterly ignore such questions. Any inhabitant of the District can urge nothing of that nature with legal force, because the welfare of the Capital is above and over all, and throughout the consideration of this subject of fiscal relations this should never be lost sight of. It is a part of our Constitution and free from local control.

On April 3, 1908, the Comptroller of the Treasury decided that the Secretary of the Treasury is not authorized to open in the books of the Treasury Department general revenues accounts of the District of Columbia. (14 Comp. Dec. 646.)

The moneys collected by taxes on real estate is paid into the Treasury not as money of the District but as "miscellaneous and it can only be drawn out by an appropriation made by Congress. Taxes so paid are no more the money or fund of the District than are revenues paid into the Treasury the property of the collector. If the money is paid to the District by an individual to construct a local improvement and is passed into the Treasury and more than the cost is paid it can only be drawn out by an appropriation. Such revenues in the Treasury are impressed with no trust, and the District is a mere agent of the Nation to perform certain duties for the sovereign. (Vol. 1, S. Doc. 247, 64th Cong., 1st sess., 933-934.)

says:
"At the end of the present fiscal year, according to the best obtainable estimate, the District revenues will exceed one-half of the appropriations by $1,136,286.03. For convenience it is customary to term this balance a surplus, but, as a matter of fact, it will be a part of the moneys of the United States and will be available for any purpose whatsoever. Thus it will be seen that in so far as it works at all the half and half works against the District and not for it.'

On page 320 of the same volume the conditions in the District from 1866 to 1871 and the then condition of public places in the District is set forth in so striking a manner that it is evident that the District prior to 1871 had attempted little outside of mere governmental functions. Indeed, much, if not the larger, effort and expenditure prior to 1871 had been toward making Washington so it could be lived in at all. When it is recalled that the Potomac Flats extended to Pennsylvania Avenue, the magnitude of the sanitation problem is evident.

There was, however, on the several municipalities or organizations within what is now that District quite a considerable indebtedness. In 1874 the bonded indebtedness amounted to $9,000,000, with a large floating debt. Without setting forth a detailed statement of the subsequent transaction between the District and the Government, but to which your attention is directed, it may with confidence be stated that in the maintenance of the District in every department the Nation has carried its full share, and in many departments more than its share. If this is not true, then let it be shown by the facts for which this act calls, and if it is true permit the truth to be known.

That there is a dispute on this point is very evident. recognized in the law we are considering. To decide that the language used therein means what the majority report claims it does is to make congressional action without force and useless.

The language of the act of June 29, 1922, relative to this committee and its duties is:

"A joint select committee, composed of three Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate and three Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, is created and is authorized and directed to inquire into all matters pertaining to the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the United States since July 1, 1874, with a view of ascertaining and reporting to Congress what sums have been expended by the United States and by the District of Columbia, respectively, whether for the purpose of maintaining, upbuilding, or beautifying the said District, or for the purpose of conducting its govenrnment or its governmental activities and agencies, or for the furnishing of conveniences, comforts, and necessities to the people of said District. Neither the cost of construction nor of maintenance of any building erected or owned by the United States for the purpose of transacting therein business of the Government of the United States shall be considered by said committee. And in event any money may be, or at any time has been by Congress or otherwise, found due, either legally or morally, from the one to the other, on account of loans, advancements, or improve-ments made, upon which interest has not been paid by either to the other, then such sums as have been or may be found due from one to the other shall be considered as bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum from the time when the principal should, either legally or morally, have been paid, until actually paid. And the committee shall also ascertain and report what surplus, if any, the District of Columbia has to its credit on the books of the Treasury of the United States which has been acquired by taxation or from licenses. And the said committee shall report its findings relative to all the matters hereby referred to it to the Senate and House, respectively, on or before the first Monday in February, 1923."

What did the committee do under this authorization and direction? It secured the services of Haskins & Sells, accountants, and secured through them an audit of the District general fund from June 30, 1911, to June 30, 1922. It secured a calculation and stating of the amount of interest on a portion only of the fund found due from one to the other. It inquired of certain persons if they knew of any other items unsettled in the accounts between these interests. It had submitted to it a report of a previous audit made by persons in no way responsible to it, and so far as known such report could not be vouched for as a complete and comprehensive audit of the

Such items as its inquiries developed, it inquired into to only a limited extent. Outside of the audit of the District general fund for the time intervening between June 30, 1911, and June 30, 1922, it has and can produce no certified audit of any period or any account. I wish to emphasize this fact: It does not have an audit that covers fully all accounts between these interests between the dates mentioned in the act, June 30, 1874, and June 30, 1922. None was made. I assume that the construction placed by the majority of the committee, hereinafter called the majority, is measured by its acts, and hence I feel there has been a misconception of the intent of the act. No accountant or auditor, no committee or part of a committee with financial reliability back of its certificate will certify to the correctness of the surplus reported or the completeness and thoroughness of the audit reported.

The effect of the majority report boiled down is that within limits of the time given a thorough audit can not be made. To make such an audit will require more money and more time than was given to the committee. It has inquired of certain persons, former officials, or auditors of a portion of these accounts if they or either of them knew of unreported items, which, if there had been items so known to such persons it would have been their duty to report, and upon receiving an answer denying knowledge of unreported items the majority have accepted as final and complete the investigation of Haskins & Sells as to the District general fund covering the period between June 80, 1911, and June 30, 1922, and certain specific items called to their attention or which were connected with the general fund. The majority believe that more can not be found and that it is unnecessary to go further and accept as complete audits which it is stated are incomplete.

The act directs this inquiry into the fiscal relations to be made

"with a view of ascertaining and reporting to Congress what sums have been expended by the United States and by the District of Columbia, respectively, whether for the purpose of maintaining, upbuilding, or beautifying the said District or for the purpose of conducting its government or its governmental activities and agencies or for the furnishing of conveniences, comforts, and necessities to the people of said District."

The foregoing provision is still within the mandate of the act and is descriptive of the extent to which the inquiry into the fiscal relations is required to go. That the majority did not so construe the act is evidenced by the fact that such information is not furnished, or if the tables submitted by the majority are intended as a compliance it is done in such a way as to be useless as information on the matter inquired about.

It will be noted that this portion of the act divides purposes for which the contributions were made into three groups; First, "for maintaining, upbuilding, or beautifying the said District"; second, for "conducting its government or its governmental activities or agencies"; and, third, for "for furnishing of conveniences, comforts, and necessities of the people of said Certainly it can not be successfully claimed such information has been given; and if not, then the majority has failed to correctly interpret the will of Congress as expressed in the act. It is claimed by the majority that "beautifying the said District" should be construed to mean only such expenditures as shall have for their purpose "primarily beautifying the said District. Conceding for the moment that this is the correct construction, as there is no report of such expenditures, it follows that Congress asked for that which under the majority construction does not exist. Of course, the interpretation or construction which inserts "primarily" before the word "beautifying" must also apply to every other word of these three phrases, and when so applied would scarcely be that for which the majority would contend. The writer is of the opinion that using the language in its ordinary sense and furnishing the information such use suggests will occasion the least difficulty. It is quite apparent what this language means when you take into consideration the sentence immediately following, which excludes from consideration the cost of any structure used for the transaction of the Federal business.

It is well understood by those in contact with District appropriations and District interests that there is constantly, when the opportunity is presented, held up to Congress the fact that Washington is the seat of the Nation's Capital, that we all, District and Nation, hope, desire, and expect to make and keep it the most beautiful city in the Nation-if possible, in the That such an accomplishment is too great a burden for the inhabitants of the District and that the Nation is not bearing its fair portion thereof; that in reducing the ratio of contribution from 50-50 to 60-40 there was an injustice and even lack of good faith, that the Nation is to a large extent living off of the District inhabitants, and so forth. This alleged undue burden is held up as one of the reasons why the alleged surplus should now be made available as a credit to the District.

One of the chief purposes to be secured by this information is to demonstrate just what the facts are as to these contributions. There are persons living in the District whose chief end and aim seems to be to disseminate misinformation, and this, long continued, has misled the inhabitants of the District and Members of Congress. The effect of these facts so sought is not, in the writer's opinion, to charge any supposed surplus with the cost of the Lincoln Memorial or any similar structure, but to present the fact as to what has been the relative contributions for such purposes and to prevent a misconception of the real situation. This information Congress asked for, is entitled to, and ought to have.

In this connection it should be borne in mind that the duty of paving streets, cleaning sidewalks, and similar duties placed on the owner of adjacent property rests more lightly on the owner or occupant in Washington than in any other similar city, and until comparatively recent years was borne entirely by the District and the Nation. Excuse, if you can, the Nation paving your street and cleaning your sidewalk.

It should always be kept in mind that the District is entirely without any legal right to this surplus, and in fixing a final balance the District and the Government should submit the entire case.

Every dollar expended by the Government in memorials, parks, and parkways, and so forth, is directly adding value to each foot of land in the District. It also increases the number of visitors to and inhabitants in the District and so increasing the income from and value of property. This is only one of many ways in which the Government bestows upon the District benefits that go to no other community and from and upon which the District and its inhabitants realize substantially.

This is the thought in the act. It is right and honest,

That the conferees on the part of the House when the provision was incorporated in the act of June 29, 1922, had this in mind is apparent from the statement before the committee of Hon. Ben Johnson on January 29-hearing, pages 202-224and also of Mr. CRAMTON, from which I quote:

There not only had been a controversy between the Federal Government and the District but there had been more or less controversy between the Senate and the House as to the proper way to settle these matters, and in different years the District bill was held up until the last minute through a dead-drawn contest of the two bodies as to the proper fiscal policy, and this 1922 act went a long way to do away with the differences between the two Houses of Congress and between the Federal Government and the District. In working out that act the views of both the Senate and the House had to be considered in order to get a settlement that would be accepted by both bodies; and I want to urge that every provision that was included in that attempted settlement in the act of 1922 should be given equal force, is equally binding upon the committee." (Hearings, p. 252.)

"There are two things that this act provides for; First, speaking of the joint select committee to be selected in a certain way, it is to do two things. This is preliminary. They are generally to 'inquire into all matter pertaining to the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the United States since July 1, 1874.' That is very definite language. A date is definitely fixed, and the duty of this committee is to inquire into all matters pertaining to the fiscal relations between the District and the United States since July 1, 1874. There is no other date that this committee has any authority to accept." (Hearings, p. 252.)

"Now, what is the purpose of that fiscal inquiry? It is twofold: One, 'with a view of ascertaining and reporting to Congress what sums have been expended by the United States and by the District of Columbia, respectively, whether for the purpose of maintaining, upbuilding, or beautifying the said District or for the purpose of conducting its government or its governmental activities and agencies, or for the furnishing of conveniences, comforts, and necessities for the people of said District.' That is first.

"And then we have, second, the following:

"And the committee shall also ascertain and report what surplus, if any, the District of Columbia has to its credit on the books of the Treasury of the United States which has been acquired by taxation or from licenses." (Hearings, p. 252.)

"Now, the twofold purpose of that inquiry it is my desire to emphasize. This committee is dealing with a proposition in equity, and it was the desire of Mr. Johnson and myself and others that this inquiry, dealing with a proposition in equity, should fully cover everything that might affect the equities of the case. So that this committee is to report not only its findings as to what particular financial balance there is and its findings as to what is the amount of surplus, if there is any equitably due the District from the Federal Treasury, but the committee owes a greater duty to Congress than that. They are to transmit to Congress information of all these financial transactions between the Federal Government and the District that might have a bearing on the equities of this case. So I am going to emphasize the first provision rather than the second one." (Hearings, p. 253.)

"Now, take the language In regard to the joint select committee, which is as follows:

"'With a view of ascertaining and reporting to Congress what sums have been expended by the United States and by the District of Columbia, respectively, whether for the purpose of maintaining, upbuilding, or beautifying the said District, or for the purpose of conducting its government or its governmental activities and agencies, or for furnishing of conveniences, comforts, and necessities to the people of said District.'

"I am not going too far when I say that if that language had not been contained in the bill this section would not have been enacted. The House could not have accepted this provision, it being the theory of the House conferees that this is a proposition in equity. And if we are going to dispose of it, then it ought to be disposed of and out of the way; but when it is disposed of as an equitable proposition, everything that affects the equities of the Government ought to be taken into consideration." (Hearings, p. 253.)

INTEREST ON BALANCE AND ADVANCES.

The committee were directed "to ascertain and report what surplus, if any, the District of Columbia has to its credit on the books of the Treasury of the United States which has been acquired by taxation or from licenses."

An alleged balance or surplus has been reported by the majority, but in reporting that balance the following sentence, which immediately precedes the direction to find and report the surplus, if any, was entirely ignored:

"And in event any money may be, or at any time has been by Congress or otherwise, found due, either legally or morally, from the one to the other on account of loans, advancements, or improvements made, upon which interest has not been paid by either to the other, then such sums as have been or may be found due from one to the other shall be considered as bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum from the time when the principal should, either legally or morally, have been paid until actually paid."

In the surplus reported no account whatever is taken of interest except as to the item of the "$240 bonus" paid to District employees, the $82,500 for the land purchases, and on the amount paid from Federal revenues for the relief of Eldred C. Davis

The majority has assumed to decide as to the matter of interest on other items in direct opposition to the specific direction of the act raising the committee. The committee are without authority to find a surplus except in accordance with the direction in the act. If those directions are not in accord with the opinions or conscience of the majority, there were at least two courses open. One was to report in accordance with the directions of Congress and supplement that report with a statement of its views where they departed from the statutory directions, and present what seemed to them a proper adjustment according to the majority views; or such as could not conscientiously act might secure relief from service. But there is no excuse for refusing to furnish the information asked while remaining a part of the investigating agent,

It was also stated that the provision contained in the first phrase of the sentence under consideration rendered the provisions of the entire sentence unworkable, in that it applied to future indebtednesses. It seems only necessary to say that there could not be a future indebtedness as referred to in the sentence "upon which interest has not been reid."

sentence "upon which interest has not been paid."

The statute is properly construed as a whole and refers only to the period between June 30, 1874, and June 30, 1922, and the indebtedness "upon which interest has not been paid" refers only to indebtedness existent during some portion of that period, and it might be in point to say that had the law intended to refer to indebtedness yet in the future the phrase probably would have been, "upon which interest shall not have been paid."

Upon consideration of the entire interest proposition it must be apparent that the act does mean that interest at 3 per cent per annum should be calculated on all sums owed by the District to the Government upon which interest was not charged for the time it was held by the District, and the same should be charged on such sums as the District advanced to the Government, and these amounts should be considered in arriving at the surplus, if such there is.

I quote from the statement of Representative Johnson made before the committee:

Representative Johnson of Kentucky. The newspaper has just been handed to me. Under the subtitle of "Questions of interest," I find the following:

"The report on page 2 states that no consideration has been given by the accountants of the question of interest. The resolution provides, in part, that: 'And in any event any money may be, or at any time has been, by Congress or otherwise, found due, either legally or morally, from the one to the other, on account of loans, advancements, or improvements made, upon which interest has not been paid by either to the other, then such sums as have been or may be found due from one to the other shall be considered as bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum from the time when the principal should, either legally or morally, have been paid, until actually paid."

Now, says the author of this report further:

"It occurs to me that this clause is not capable of literal administration for several reasons, among which are the following: It seems to contemplate the calculation by your committee of interest upon sums which Congress may in the future find due."

The question there depends upon what is meant by "future." As the author of the language I intended to say, and with such of the committee at that time as I went over the matter with, thought that I had clearly said, and still think that I have clearly said, and they thought so, too, that the language there meant not after the conclusion of this report; but you see this language was written and went into a bill which was to become effective on the 1st day of the following July. Immediately following the 1st of July the subcommittee, which is now sitting, was to commence its work, and the word "future" there meant as to what the accountants or that subcommittee might find for the past, or, in other words, the language there was intended to express, and in my humble opinion, clearly expresses, that interest was to be accounted for at the rate of 3 per cent per annum on all amounts which then had, by Congress or otherwise, been found to be due or which thereafter might be found to be due; "thereafter" or "future," whichever expression you choose to take, meaning that which thereafter or in the future would be found to be due by this committee. Consequently, I contend that it is very easily workable. (Hearings, p. 203.)

It is also suggested as a defense against this interest charge that in two cases the setting aside by act of Congress of certain sum "in full" or "in full settlement" precluded the recovery of interest, and ought to in effect estop the Government from any claim in such case against the District.

There were two cases of this character. The amounts in each case had been admitted by those representing the District. The one was carried in the sundry civil bill, and was first presented in committee by a typewritten provision, as follows (64th Cong., 1st sess., sundry civil, H. R. 15836):

"To further reimburse the United States and in full the amount due on account of one-half of the per capita cost of maintenance of indigent patients in the Government Hospital for the Insane from the District of Columbia in excess of the number charged to and paid for by said District during the fiscal years 1879 to 1912, inclusive, together with interest at the rate of two per cent per annum on yearly balance of said indebtedness from June 30, 1962, to June 30, 1912, inclusive, there shall be transferred from the revenues of the District of Columbia to the United States the sum of $486,524.27 $282,754.26."

The provision carried into the bill presented to the House only the language not stricken through and which removes all reference to interest. During the consideration by the House I have been unable to find any allusion to the subject of interest either in the committee report or the Congressional Record. In other words, the House never considered the matter of interest. It follows that if Congress "inadvertently" and without damage or injury to the District failed to require the interest at that time it is strictly in accordance with equity and good morals that it should now, out of this fund to which it has no legal right, make good this mistake.

The construction of the laws made by the majority is erroneous as to the matter of interest charges.

If all that is contended for on behalf of the majority construction as to the effect of appropriation acts were true, it could not avail in this case, as the act of June 29, 1921, in specific terms declares the wish of Congress and the law in this case. To refuse to accept such direction is for the majority to assume that as a committee by a majority vote it can overthrow the expressed will of the lawmaking body of the Nation. Indeed, if its position is sustained it means that one Member of either the Senate or House in such a committee can disregard the law as one in a majority can do all that the majority in this case has done.

Under the act of June 10, 1879, there was authorized an issue of what has been known as the 5-20 bonds, the amount of the issue being $1,002,300. To redeem these bonds cost the "interest and sinking fund" $1,133,848.04, principal, and interest amounting to $887,127.50, making an aggregate of $2,020,943.54, which was paid from the "interest and sinking fund."

In this connection it is well to recall that the "interest and sinking fund" item is created and made necessary by the act authorizing another bond issue, the 3.65 bonds, for the express purpose of providing for the payment of the interest and retirement of only the last-named bonds. It was never by congressional action made available for the 5-20 bonds, nor, so far as I have been able to discover, has there ever been in the House of Representatives while this fund was used for the payment of the 5-20 bonds any mention that such payment was being so made.

Congress never intended, and no congressional action ever warranted, the payment of either the interest or principal of the 5-20 bonds. Except that it was estimated for by Treasury officials, it was never called to the attention of Congress. It should be borne in mind that the act authorizing this issue of bonds expressly provides "That this act shall not be construed to make the Government of the United States liable for either the principal or interest of said bonds or any part thereof." Not only so, but Congress, by its action each year from 1900 to 1909, expressly required that the District should pay interest on advances from the Federal Treasury to pay the ordinary expenses of the District where the District revenues were insufficient to pay the 50 per cent made chargeable to it. (See 31 Stat. 766; 32 Stat. 616, 981; 33 Stat. 391, 915; 34 Stat. 517, 1157; 35 Stat. 311, 727.)

It must appeal to all reasoning minds that Congress was not at that time charging interest against the District on advances to pay its general expenses and at the same time knowingly paying the principal and interest on the 5-20 bonds which it had expressly declared should be no charge against the Government. To have done so intentionally means following two different policies at the same moment in the same bill, one neutralizing the effect of the other.

With these acts in mind it is not reasonable to believe or suppose that, when the attention of Congress was in no way called specifically to the fact that it was appropriating to the payment of these 5-20 bonds, when the name or designation of the fund would only indicate that the appropriation was for the payment of the interest and principal of the 3.65 bonds, Congress intended by the appropriation to pay half of the bonds and interest for the payment of which it had expressly provided it would not be obligated. Another fact that seems significant is that the interest payments on these two classes of bonds, those with Government guaranty and those without, are not in any way separated in the United States Treasury accounts, and from the Treasury accounts it can not be told what interest was paid on the 5-20 bonds and what on the 3.65 bonds and what on the 3.50-10 year bonds. To obtain this information other sources of information than the entries on the Treasury accounts are necessary. It is not meant to reflect on the District or District agents by these facts, but it is intended to suggest that those in the Treasury in charge of this account were not enemies of the District and to insist that Congress did not have the information that should have been forthcoming from them, and there is sufficient proof in these facts that Congress did not intend in this respect an entire reversal of its attitude as definitely and positively expressed in the act authorizing the issuance of the bonds.

Indeed, the Comptroller of the Treasury when fixing the proportional liability as between the District and the Government on the 3.65 bonds refers to the pledge in the act authorizing the 3.65 issue and assigns such pledge as the reason for the liability on the part of the Government.

It follows that absence of the pledge would relieve the Government of liability and an express inhibition against liability ought to fix the liability of the District in a case such as is presented by the 5-20 bonds.

From the examination of the Congressional Record and the various committee reports it is apparent that in making appropriation for "interest and sinking fund" of the 5-20 bonds out of which half the interest was paid, it was never brought to the attention of Congress that it was such an item or carried supprent. The same is true of interest on the postponed payment for the maintenance of the District insane at St. Elizabeths Hospital and the Washington market rentals.

In none of these cases did Congress act directly upon the question nor was it called to the attention of the House.

In the case of the $240 bonus for District employees the mention of the item at once called to the attention of Congress the exact purpose for which the appropriation was made. The same is true in the appropriation for land for the Zoological Park. In the latter case the majority, I believe, properly charged the District with half of the respective amounts. There was practically no objection from District sources to such charge. representative of the Department of Justice was the only one who might be said not to concede the majority action to be right. When you justify the position taken by the majority as to these cases where the items themselves suggest all that is involved in the appropriation what way of escape can there be from applying the same rule where neither in the report accompanying the appropriation bill nor in any statement in debate in the House (I did not examine the debate in the Senate) nor in the items themselves was there anything to suggest that what was there being done was to relieve the District of a lawful and equitable charge against it.

It must be apparent to every fair-minded man that when year after year the Congress by specific language was requiring the District to pay interest on the various sums advanced for its general expenses that it is unreasonable to suppose that when the District was growing more able to pay Congress decided to relieve it of all its just burdens even in cases where it had placed a positive inhibition against such relief. The fact is all of these items should be considered and charged against the District if it is once decided that there is a surplus to be considered at all.

The power to adjust the balances between the Treasury of the United States and the District is vested in Congress and no place else. (Judge Downey, 21 Vol. Comp. Dec. 393 et seq.)

Page 398 "The pledge for proportionate appropriation for payment of interest on the 3.65 bonds, therefore, was given in contemplation of a plan for a division of this obligation which, when adopted and enacted, fixed the division at 50 per cent. However, in this case the Congress by appropriation did advance the interest on the 3.65 bonds with the provision that it should be reimbursed, bearing in mind that the act authorizing the issuance of these bonds, placed on Congress the duty of seeing them and interest paid, no such duty was upon Congress with reference to the 5-20 bonds.

Judge Downey (20 Comp. Dec. 441, p. 443). "The funded debt for which this appropriation was made as shown by the 'Report of the Treasurer of the United States' on the sinking fund and the funded debt of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, consists entirely of what are commonly known as the 3.65 funding bonds of the District of Columbia."

What is known as the "organic act" was approved June 11, 1878. The 3.65 bonds issued under the act of June 20, 1874, were guaranteed by the Federal Government and to be paid by the District and the United States in proportionate shares to be subsequently fixed, which was done by the so-called organic act and subsequent legislation.

The act of June 20, 1874, ordered the creation of an "interest and sinking fund" to provide for the interest and retirement of the 3.65 bonds and applied to none other. This fund was supplied by appropriations in the bills in which appropriations for the District were carried.

The act of June 10, 1879, five years after the act authorizing the 3.65 bonds, one year after the act of June 11, 1878, the organic act," so called, authorized the issuance of $1,200,000, known as the 5-20 bonds, and under which authorization $1,092,-300 in bonds were issued. The act by which the 5-20 bonds were authorized expressly provided that the United States should not be obligated for either interest, principal, or any part thereof. The act authorizing the issue of these bonds did not provide for a sliking fund or refer to that already provided for the 3.65 bonds. Congress has never so provided. The Treasurer of the United States, after the abolishing of the sinking-fund commissioners of the District, became ex officio sliking-fund commissioner, and each year when submitting estimates for the interest and retirement of the 3.65 bonds included the amount necessary to pay the interest on the 5-20 bonds, and when retiring those bonds also submitted estimates for a sufficient amount for that purpose. The appropriation bill carried as one item under the denomination "Interest and sinking fund" such an amount as not only took care of the 3.65 bonds but also the 5-20 bonds. It is certain that the House membership at no time when action was taken on the item of "interest and sinking fund" knew that It included the interest on the 5-20 bonds or provided for their retirement. Few, if any, knew that the act authorizing those bonds expressly provided that the Government should not be liable for any part of the principal or interest. Members now here who participated in those appropriations will recall their lack of such knowledge.

It is urged on behalf of the District that it has been held that the term "general expenses," as applied to the District, included interest on the funded debt and that the 5-20 bonds are a part of the funded debt of the District, and that under the act of June 11, 1878, the Government was bound to pay one-half of the "general expenses" of the District. This position entirely omits consideration of the fact that the act of June 11, 1878, is general in its character and was prior to the act of June 10, 1879, which is special in its character and contained a provision expressly negativing the intent to include the interest on the 5-20 bonds as a part of the "general expense" of the District. Thus there is no escape from the conclusion that the District owes to the Government by reason of its payment of one-half of the 5-20 bonds the sum of $1,010,-486.77, with interest on the several sums of which it is composed or made up, from the times of payment by the Government in accordance with the directions contained in the act raising the joint select committee.

It is suggested in the majority report that congressional action by appropriation bills, on moral or equitable grounds, conclude the government. Such a statement ought to carry its own refutation to even those who suggest it.

There is absolutely no consideration for an appropriation to the benefit of one not a creditor of the United States. It of itself deprives the person for whose benefit made of no advantage and it puts him at no disadvantage. The position of the Government in its relations to the District is most nearly analogous to that of the parent of two or more children. He can give to one of them in infancy what he thinks it needs.

He may advance to it in excess of what the other children get in the way of education or clothing or favor it in the character of duties imposed upon it, but because the father has so done is no reason why such child should object when required to perform the same duties and wear the same clothes as his brother or that he is taken from school or travel and put to work. Indeed, should the father lease him a farm, rent free, and pay for half his improvements and implements, and then permit him or aid him to make a loan which the parent re-fuses to indorse, but of which, when it comes due, he pays half of the principal and interest, it ill becomes the son in the settlement of accounts with his father to say: "I worked you, and although I have been used better than my brother, I should not be made to pay this; I repudiate my legal, equitable, and moral obligation." Such, however, is the attitude of those representing the District on the 5-20 bond. The District has more advantages given to it by the United States without charge and more gifs bestowed upon it than any other city in the United States, indeed than to all other cities combined.

The auditors or accountants, Haskins & Sells, in their report present this item as a proper charge against the District. Mayes did likewise in their report. Although the majority report claims that Congress has acted thereon, I have been unable to discover where it has been before Congress other than that it has been mentioned in the Mayes report to the subcommittee having in charge the Mayes investigation. As stated, I have been unable to discover any presentation of the item to Congress and the majority cite no such presentation. If there had been such action by Congress, Mr. Donovan, the District auditor, Mr. Galloway, or Mr. Colladay would certainly have called it to the attention of the committee.

On pages 194-195 of the hearings, the extent of the inquiry being the subject under consideration, occurs the following:

'Evans. In order to have a specific case, there used to be the old Georgetown bonds, and there were subsequently District bonds, or Washington bonds, I guess, that were not included in the 3.65 bonds or ever guaranteed by the Federal Govern-They were upon the estimates presented to the Appropriations Committee paid 50-50. Now, do I understand that such a case as that you would consider not a proper case for the auditors to go into?

"Mr. Donovan, No. sir.

"Evans. And that they ought to go into.

"Mr. Donovan, Absolutely.

But later Mr. Donovan expressed a different opinion on these bonds (see p. 195).

This quotation, however, gives the attitude of the District auditor on conditions similar to the 5-20 bonds.

Suppose that under present conditions, with the majority report recommending the recognition of a four and one-half million surplus for the District, and that no action should be taken thereon, even though it has been expressly called to the attention of both Houses, will it be contended that failure of Congress to act concludes the District's claim to such surplus?

Such, however, is the position assumed by the majority as to this claim for Government credit on the 5-20 bonds and interest on various items. There is no question as to the justice of the debt, but because the Government was liberal in granting time the District pleads that liberality as a defense.

Apparently It is the claim of the majority of the committee in its report that recently Congress has been refusing to appropriate as much as the District desired and needed, and that this accounts for the surplus, the intention being to carry the thought that the difference between estimates and appropriations was in a different plane recently than that formerly adopted. Estimates since 1893, by years, are submitted herewith and are followed by the appropriations for the same period.

1923 (permanent annual and indefinite appropriations)_	1, 021, 000. 00

It will be seen that while there was a slight reduction in one or two years that there has been a gradual increase throughout the entire period.

The majority report also challenges attention to the fact that since 1912 the appropriations have not been equal to the estimates, and by inference, if not statements, convey the impression that this is unusual and had not been the fact prior to 1912, and the statement is also made that this failure to appropriate the amount estimated and because appropriations were so reduced the surplus accumulated. The majority fails to state that for some of the years covered there was an estimate calling for expenditure of large amounts exclusively from the Federal funds, but does include those amounts in the estimates copied into the report.

Schedule 1 of the Mapes report shows that the total District revenues in 1912 were $7,078,091.16, and that there was a gradual increase, until in 1922 the amount was $13,917,005.62, approximately doubling in 11 years. This fact and a comparison of the preceding tables refute the majority statements referred to so far as material to the consideration of the subject in hand.

In this connection it is also urged that expenditures for public schools in the District during the war were reduced. expenditures for schools, by years, since 1914 follow:

It is apparent from this table that schools have been fairly treated. In the writer's opinion, if the people of the District should turn their energies to securing an intelligent expenditure of their own and the Nation's contributions to this fund, instead of directing floods of abuse at Congress, many of the existent evils would disappear. This comment is recognized as not material to the determination of the point in dispute, but as conditions in schools and alleged disparity between estimates and appropriations have been injected into this controversy, it is submitted for consideration of such as are really interested in schools rather than getting money out of the Treasury.

TAX RATE IN THE DISTRICT.

There is another matter which is constantly being injected into the fiscal relations, which were under investigation and alluded to in the majority report; that is, the tax rate of the District as compared with the tax rate of other cities of approximately the same population. Several methods of comparison have been used in making the comparisons. One has been by a comparison of the rates mentioned in the various legislative acts fixing the same. Another is taking the gross tax of the taxing districts, dividing that by the population of the district, and comparing the results, and is called the per capita method. Both of these are inaccurate and used by no person intelligently seeking the truth.

The only accurate method is to compare the selling price of property, fixed by actual sales and the tax paid in the year on that property in one taxing district, with that in another district measured in the same way, or in place of the selling price substitute the annual earnings of the property for the selling price, and make the comparison, or in some cases it may be necessary to take a combination of the two methods, but in every case use the same method in each taxing district and use the same class of property when making comparisons. This method is recognized by courts where a legal controversy requires comparisons of tax rates, and by business interests when it has become material in locating investments or in making comparisons.

So measured, the District tax rate is from three-fifths to onethird of the rate of cities of its class. Having in mind the fact that legally there can be no surplus in favor of the District, that its tax rate is most favorable to its inhabitants, that during recent years, while the tax rate of all other communities in our country was going mountain high to meet the ordinary running expenses of their local government and their earning power was down to almost zero, that the District still retained the same tax rate and the earning power of its wealth was soaring to heights not dreamed of heretofore, it now says, "We wish to have re-turned to us a share of what under these circumstances we did pay into the Treasury under the law, and we demand that you do not even charge us with that which you advanced to us to carry us back to financial respectability when our own lack of self-governing power and ability had made us bankrupt, and the only reason being urged in support of this position is that Congress at that time did not insist on a strict account and payment.

THE INVESTIGATION MADE BY THE COMMITTEE HAS COVERED NEITHER THE PERIOD NOR THE EXTENT THAT CONGRESS DIRECTED.

The language of the act is very plain in two particulars, i. e., the period covered, June 30, 1874, to time of the act June 30, 1922, and the matters covered; that is, all matters pertaining to the fiscal relations.

¹ It was recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury that these estimates be reduced to $11,299,364.

¹ It was recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury that these estimates be reduced to $11,598,222.

¹ It was recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury that these estimates be reduced to $5,602,125.17.

There has been but one fund to which the investigation of Haskins & Sells has gone—the District general fund. If there have been other items followed or investigated, it has been because such items have been connected with the District general fund or the inquiry has been made on special request of the committee or its chairman or a member. The same is true of the Mayes investigation. Nothing has been done outside of the District general fund unless the item was connected with the general fund or unless there were instructions to the accountants to investigate a particular item or group of items.

The remarkable thing about it all is that it is from items outside of the general fund that the debits against the District have nearly always been found. It will be found that when a complete and thorough investigation has been made that the oversights and omissions will be in matters not strictly within the general fund. The reason for this is plain. It is an account with the appropriations and in touch by practically daily audits by both the District and the Treasury. This is not true of the "interest and sinking fund" handled in the Treasury alone, or of an account such as the Washington Market, the District insane, or even rentals when they go into the District account without a check back.

It is because of these conditions that now is the time to check up all appropriations made wholly from Federal funds and which reach the District or benefit it and at the same time to search all receipts to their sources so as to determine whether or not the District has received revenues equitably belonging to the Government or, on the other hand, to assure to the District those millions in addition to the surplus found by the majority which is claimed for it by those representing it.

At a meeting held on January 20, 1923, and after Haskins & Sells had made their report, the committee considered what the scope of its investigations should be.

A reading of the stenographic report of that meeting (see typewritten copy, pp. 69 to 76, 91, 95, 97) will disclose what Chairman Phipps, Senator Ball, Senator Harris, Congressman Wright, and myself thought at that time. Each of the persons mentioned expressed an opinion favoring the making of only a partial or preliminary report and requesting further time and additional funds to make a complete, a thorough investigation.

At that meeting the following motion was unanimously adopted: "In order to bring something before the committee I move that the chairman be instructed to have prepared and present to the two Houses, the Senate and the House of Representatives, a report which shall in substance state the work done, without giving conclusions, and that it is the opinion of the committee that it should be continued, and with additional funds sufficient to thoroughly cover the entire work submitted to the committee," (See pp. 74 and 96 of typewritten report.)

By some inadvertence the report of the meeting of January 20, 1923, was not published with or made a part of the majority report. It is, therefore, proper to say that the meeting of January 20, 1923, was held after the Haskins & Sells report, with the comments of the District auditor, the comptroller's representative, the Department of Justice's representative, and Mr. Hodgson thereon presented separately, had been made. I shall quote from the expressions of the members of the committee made at that time:

"The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

"We are all aware of the fact that on account of the short period of time allotted us in which to make a report our decision was made that we should not attempt to begin with the year 1874 but should first have the auditors cover the 11 years from the time that audits were last submitted, although they may have been only partial audits, up to July 1 of last year. I think the wisdom of that has been shown from the fact that the auditors have found it difficult even to complete the work of the 11 years, going back, of course, into former years where it was necessary to check up the data and give us any time at all to submit a report to the Congress.

"From the data we have before us, from what little study I have been able to give it—and I have not had much time, because I have been crowded with other matters—it would seem to me that our report to the Congress will have to take the form of a partial or preliminary report in any event. I doubt that we have sufficient data before us on which to agree on a recommendation to the Congress for the settlement of all matters in dispute as between the District and the Federal Government; and, as I see it, we shall have to consider whether or not our proper course would be to make a preliminary report and to ask for additional time, during which the auditors and the committee can work, during the recess of the Congress; and I am informed that if we do that and continue the audit so as to make it complete over the years prior to 1911, as contemplated in the act appointing us, the fund allotted of $20,000 would be insufficient to pay the total cost of the work, and we would probably have to ask for authority to continue and an additional appropriation of about $10,000, from the best information I can obtain.

"Senator Ball. Do you not think, Mr. Chairman, that this report, since we have commenced the investigation, should be a final report that would forever settle this matter, even though we should have to ask for additional time and funds? There have been so many reports that have not been complete. Now, if we are going to make a report I would feel that we ought to make one that would answer all inquiries in the future. That would be my feeling in the matter.

"The CHAIRMAN. The Members, of course, will remember that the thought of the committee was that possibly the auditors going into the affairs for the past 11 years could determine whether or not the audits previously made up to July 1. 1911, could be properly accepted by this committee as conclusive and covering the earlier years, so as to avoid performing work which has already been gone over by accredited auditors. I do not know what your personal views are since receiving the report now submitted by Haskins & Sells, but my own feelings in the matter is that the committee could not conscientiously submit a report with recommendations that they felt should be conclusive on the District and on the Federal Government, and it would leave undetermined certain items of dispute, which have been brought into question and regarding which differences of opinion have arisen as between the auditors and the representatives of the District and others, and I might say also in the minds of the committee; so that I doubt if we would be justified in attempting to formulate what would be looked upon as a final report and as expressing the views of the members of the committee. It would be inconclusive.

"Representative WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I am impressed that the legislation which created this committee contemplated that the entire period from 1874 on up should be covered; and if it be necessary, to render a report which would finally settle these mooted questions between the United States and the District of Columbia; in other words, when this report shall have been filed that Congress can take such action upon it as will finally set at rest these disputed items. I think that was thoroughly in contemplation when the legislation was passed.

"Now, the chairman has suggested that only 11 years of that period have been covered, and that that coupled with the formal report might clear up the situation so that a comprehensive report might be submitted by this committee.

"It has developed that the examination of those 11 years alone has consumed practically all the time—

"Representative Hardy of Colorado. And all the money.

"Representative Wright (continuing). And all the money; so that this committee has very little time to formulate a report, and the question arises as to whether we have sufficient data or information now to render that report.

"This thought occurs to me: What would be the status of this committee after the 29th of February, which is the date fixed as that upon which we should render this report. If we submit a preliminary report, would we not necessarily have to ask Congress to extend our time and make an additional authorization of appropriation for the work?

"Senator Ball. Would you suggest a preliminary report?

"Representative WRIGHT. I think that would be the sensible thing to do. I hardly see how it would be physically possible for this committee to thoroughly investigate all of these items, with the issues which have been raised here, between now and the first Monday in February.

"Senator Ball. Personally I would rather submit no report until we were ready with our final report. We might make a statement in this preliminary report, if one were submitted, that we would find afterwards was not well founded, and it would be in existence and would be quoted in the future, probably, against our final report.

"Representative Wright. I would certainly want to avoid what the Senator suggests. If you made a preliminary report, it would not particularly bind anybody. My idea would be to have Haskins & Sells submit a preliminary report.

"The CHAIRMAN. A preliminary report could be in two forms, as I see it, one including the figures or recommendations, and another, which would be practically a report of progress, with an explanation of the situation that has developed.

"Senator Ball. That is the kind of report I would like to

"The CHAIRMAN, With a recommendation for further time and, if necessary, that further money be allowed for the pur-

"Representative WRIGHT. But the thought I have right now is, do the members of the committee feel that by the 1st of February we can submit such a comprehensive report about this situation that we can suggest that Congress act upon it? I suppose that what Congress wants is to have this committee throw some light on this question so that they can legislate Now, the quesand forever set at rest these mooted questions. tion still arises in my mind, What will be the status of this committee after the 1st of February?

"If we submit a preliminary report which will not settle anything except to state that we have made some progress, but we do not come to any definite conclusion, suppose Congress does not continue us; suppose it refuses to make a further appropriation, then has not all this gone for naught?

The CHAIRMAN, I do not think so.

"Senator HARRIS. Do you not think that this would be the best idea? We are not ready with our report. I think that we ought not to say anything. I think a preliminary report would not be worth anything, unless it would throw light on the whole question, after all these years. Had we not better determine to do this: To ask Congress to give us time within which to complete this report and give our findings or else just make a preliminary report, showing the findings of the auditors and anything that we definitely determine in regard to it? And then we are through. It seems to me we had better not do anything until we find out whether we can get time enough to finish this. I think it is important. We have already spent a lot of money, and we ought to spend enough money to complete it.

"Senator Ball. The money spent is absolutely wasted unless we make a final report that stands for the future. Now, we are not ready to do that, and we can not be ready by the 1st of February, if we are to cover this whole proposition. But if we make a report now, even though it is termed a preliminary report, giving figures, those figures are going to be referred to in future, and will always muddle the situation in the future to some extent."

It is claimed by members of the majority that these excerpts are from the proceedings of an executive session of the The facts are that besides the members of the committee there were present the stenographer, Mr. Galloway, and Mr. Hill. The motion above referred to was unanimously adopted. The chairman, by motion, was authorized to appoint a secretary and was authorized to make public various reports or comments on the Haskins & Sells report.

It is claimed that after this the members signing the majority report changed their minds as to the necessity of making further investigation and that as the minutes of a meeting held on January 27 were not published the minutes of the meeting of January 20 should not be published. This majority report evidences the change of mind and it is assumed gives reasons satisfactory to the majority for that change. No complaint is made because of the change and the minority only gives the majority's views before the changes to substantiate the minority view.

All minutes of meetings and of hearings were in the control and the possession of the chairman and the majority. As the minority, the writer received just that which he requested. He asked for the extension of the stenographic notes of the hearings and secured among others that of January 20. It includes the statements of the chairman, the members of the committee, and of Mr. Hill and Mr. Galloway, with the action of the committee on the motions presented. It was not announced as an executive session and nothing not perfectly proper to be made public occurred.

The majority report when urging the comprehensive and conclusive character of the Mayes report (H. Doc. 1627, 63d Cong., 3d sess.), emphasizes unduly the language of the committee in submitting it. As noted with context it is "On February 26, 1915, a finished report was submitted to the subcommittee by the accountants," etc. The majority report in stressing the phrase "a finished report" seeks to carry the impression that it was a complete report of a complete investigation. To one not acquainted with the facts such a conclusion may be logical and natural. It is not asking too much of the majority for it to have lumbia in the Government Hospital for the Insane is not considered in this account, because the audit of said account at the Government Hospital for the Insane is not yet completed." This was specifically called to the attention of the committee by its chairman at the meeting on January 29, 1923, so that the majority knew that the Mayes report was not, as is inferred, a complete report. (Hearings, 240.) The fact was that Mr. Mayes, sr., had secured other employment and ceased to work for the investigating committee, and the report referred to finished his connection with the work. It was the close of his work and

Under the conditions now present it is scarcely to be expected that the minority can get all of the setting of 10 years ago. The majority report does show that after the "finished report" was presented Mr. W. W. Spaulding continued at this work intermittently until in 1918, and that other amounts due the Government from the District were discovered, admitted to be due, and ordered paid. The majority certainly knew that the "finished report" did not refer to a complete audit of all accounts. No man at either end of the Capitol has such thorough knowledge of the relations between the District and the Government as Hon. BEN JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly no one knows more of the House committee work as covered by the Mayes and Spaulding audits covering the period from 1878 to 1911 than he.

It was upon his motion that such action was taken. He was before the joint committee, and I quote a part of his comment before the committee on those audits:

"They were not what you might call, Senator, audits in the rict sense of the word. They were supposed to look through strict sense of the word. the acts of Congress and find where Congress had made loans or advancements to the District of Columbia, with the distinct understanding that those that the District should reimburse, they should make a report as to those. Now, they did report as to several of those, and the Congress directed what they found, and which finally became undisputed, to be returned to the United States. But there was not an audit of the accounts between the District of Columbia and the United States made by either Mayes or Spaulding.

"The Chairman. That could be termed a complete audit, you "Representative Johnson of Kentucky. Yes.

"The CHAIRMAN. There were audits made, but you would not term them complete audits?

"Representative Johnson of Kentucky. Why, I would term them most incomplete." (Hearings, p. 199.)

It is stated in the majority report that Mr. Johnson has spoken "against the necessity for or advisability" of "a further detailed audit" of the period between July 1, 1874, and June 30, 1911.

This is an error. Mr. Johnson stated in substance that it was not necessary to audit the portion-not the period-of the accounts audited by Mayes, which was the general fund and some special items. The Member from Kentucky does not need assistance from the majority or minority either in the expression of his views or their interpretations, and this mention is only made that this statement of the majority may not remain unchallenged.

On page 202 Congressman Johnson, in answer to a question by Senator Ball, states:

"Representative Johnson of Kentucky. You take it for granted; your premise is laid down now that a former Congress has settled this. There I take issue with you. I do not think the former Congress ever settled it.

Now, Mayes and Spaulding made reports that they found that many advances to the District of Columbia under certain congressional acts had been paid to the District of Columbia with the provision that the United States was to be reimbursed, and then their report was as to the amounts advanced, and the report also was to the fact that no reimbursement had ever So the two naked facts of advancement to the District and nonpayment by the District to the United States of a specified amount were the extent of their reports.

"Then the Appropriations Committee just put in the appropriation bill clauses requiring the District of Columbia to account for and pay the amounts so reported, saying nothing whatever of interest, as to whether it was to be calculated at some other time or whether it was to be remitted.

"That condition relates to the insane asylum affairs and to a number of other items. If I had known I was coming here, I would have read the report." (Hearings, p. 202.)

would have read the report. (Hearings, p. 202.)

When Hon. Ben Johnson was before the committee he made the following statement in answer to questions then asked him:

"Representative Evans. The Mayes, and subsequent to them Mr. Spaulding, were asked to check up the matter of disbursements against the matter of appropriations for the period mentioned, were they not?

"Representative Johnson of Kentucky. For the purposes

mentioned; yes

"Representative Evans. Now, were there any other items investigated by either the Mayes or Mr. Spaulding except such as were specifically called to their attention.

"Representative Johnson of Kentucky. If they went into the investigation of anything except matters to which their attention was specifically invited by the House District Committee, I am not aware of it.
"Representative Evans. Was that investigation under the control of the District Committee?

"Representative Johnson of Kentucky. It was under the control of a subcommittee of the District of Columbia Committee.

"Representative Evans. What relation had you to the District Committee and to that subcommittee?

Representative Johnson of Kentucky. I was chairman of the House District Committee and I was chairman of that subcommittee." (Hearings, p. 209.)

That the Mayes report did not pretend to be a completed investigation of the accounts under consideration was called to the committee's attention. (Id. 240.)

On January 31, being the Wednesday immediately preceding the Monday on which the majority report was filed and presented, the minority member inquired of Mr. Hill, the representative of Haskins & Sells, the accountants employed by the committee, whether or not Haskins & Sells would then, without an additional audit, cover with a certificate or under their signature the accuracy of a statement of account of the period preceding June 30, 1911. His reply was, "Absolutely not."

DISTRICT CLAIMS PRIOR TO JUNE 30, 1911.

From the hearing held on August 22, 1922 (see pp. 184-186 and 187-188 of the hearings), it is very apparent that both Mr. Galloway and Mr. Donovan are satisfied that an investigation of the period from 1874 to 1911 could not show any sum due to the Government, and that, although it might show something due the District, it is by them deemed a "dead issue," although there might be something in the accounts of that period showing a credit in favor of the District of Columbia, "because the Mayes account does not purport to cover the District's side of the story between those years." If there was no search for Dis-trict credits, its case was not closed nor is it a "dead issue."

On page 188 of the hearings it is suggested that the District has a claim of a million dollars that has merit-at least is an equitable claim for reimbursement against the Government. If so, it ought to be considered.

Mr. Edward F. Colladay, representing the citizens' joint committee of the District, appearing before this committee, stated: "While we believe that a restatement of the account, such as a literal following of the act under which this committee is proceeding might be said to call for, would raise up millions creditable to the District of Columbia's side of the account, both principal and interest, if interest is to be treated as due in the absence of a statute or contract providing for it," he wished to have the investigation kept away from so much of the period covered by the act raising this committee as is included between the years 1874 and 1911. (Hearings, pp. 246-247.) Neither the District auditor, the representative assigned by the Department of Justice, nor the representative of the citizens' joint committee, nor any other person, association, or official, excepting only Congress, can take away from the District that which belongs to it legally, equitably, or morally under the act under which this committee conducts its investigations; and while Congress has that power, it should not so wrong any person or. community.

Justice, equity, morals, and the commands of Congress require that this investigation should be thorough and should be so complete that no person in the future shall be able in good faith to say that the District has been deprived of a million dollars either legally, equitably, or morally its due. It will furnish to no Member of either Senate or House an excuse or justification for his action to say that the District auditor, or a legal adviser. or the representative of groups of District inhabitants announced their willingness to forego such claim. It is a claim neither one nor all of them nor this committee has the power or the right to give away or foreclose. This committee should determine the truth or falsity of such claim by conducting the investigation Congress directed it to make.

I know this investigation may secure information which will make the tax burden on the taxpayers of this Nation heavier; but if the children in the District do not have school facilities, and the District's inhabitants can not get to and from their homes because of lack of proper ways, and the District has a million dollars due it from the Government with interest thereon for at least 12 years, Congress should determine that fact and make payment. If, however, there is a million dollars due from the District to the Government, with interest on it for 20 or 30 years, I would not be averse to requiring the District to collect that money and make payment of its debt.

It is quite possible that the majority in presenting the report it has may be pulling a wooden horse into the citadel, or mayhap the Greeks still bear gifts.

SALARIES OF ARMY OFFICERS DETAILED TO DISTRICT SERVICE.

An item mentioned in the report of Haskins & Sells has not received the attention it merits-engineer officers detailed by the Army for District work whose salaries are wholly paid by the Government.

These men so detailed are men whose counterparts in similar cities as a rule receive large salaries. No other city can secure a similar detail. It has been suggested that on river work to which they are assigned they are paid by the Government, but the rivers are under the War Department. It is suggested that they are assigned to advise in engineering problems, but even in that case the service rendered is only advisory, of short dura-tion, and nothing more. In this case, however, it is all kinds of engineering work, streets, water, auto vehicles, every branch of engineering work in the city. The salary of the Engineer Commissioner might be excepted, but even as to that no sufficient reason can be given for the exception. I do not wish to be understood that where that work has anything to do with the Potomac in its navigable reaches or where that service is expended upon the conduit outside the District boundaries these services should be charged to the District and Government joint account. Where the service is expended on a subject where the District jurisdiction does not extend the District should bear no portion of the salary or expense, but for services rendered within the District for the exclusive benefit of occupants of the District salaries and expenses should be paid from the joint Government and the District budget.

In any event the amounts so paid should be reported for the information of Congress and its future action.

PREMIUM ON 3.65 BONDS.

There seems to be no question but that the Treasury purchased, at a premium not authorized by law, bonds of the 3.65 bond issue and one-half of this premium was taken out of the revenues of the District. If, as is indicated by the act under which we are working, the District is to have set to its credit such sums as have been improperly charged against its revenues, here is an item for which it is certainly entitled to have credit. It had not control over the "interest and sinking fund or over the purchases of bonds made from it or over the estimates upon which the appropriations were based. The officers responsible for all these matters were Federal and Congress was directly responsible for so placing the control. Justice and equity would credit back to the District the half of these pre-

There was $5,000 appropriated some years since to purchase land for the National Training School for Girls. This fund has been expended and no land purchased. One of the interests here is entitled to credit for half the amount.

This is an item which, if investigation shows "misapplication," was not discovered by any audit.

FINES AND FEES IN DISTRICT COURTS.

There is an item in the Haskins & Sells report to which it calls special attention; that is, fines and fees in the District Supreme Court. There is another item in that report to which special attention is not called: Fines in the police court of the District, which during the period covered by the Haskins & Sells audit amounted to $1,536,958.73. It was all covered to the District's credit and should have been divided.

These courts are supported from the joint appropriation, except that clerk and marshal of the former are paid entirely from Government funds. It is the opinion of the writer that both of these should be divided between the District and Government on the basis of their contributions.

III.

THE FINDINGS BY THE MAJORITY OF A SURPLUS OF $4,438,154.92 AS DUE TO THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA IS NOT SUPPORTED BY FACTS OR LAW.

In order that there shall be a surplus in favor of the District in the Treasury of the United States under the law, it must appear that all accounts between the District and the Government from June 30, 1874, to June 30, 1922, have been audited and that the balance sheet covering that entire period shows such balance.

THE MAJORITY DID NOT SO FIND THE SURPLUS THEY REPORT.

The only period that has been covered by the majority audit is that between June 30, 1911, and June 30, 1922. The only account covered in that period is that of the District general fund. Other funds or appropriations not contained in the District appropriation acts have not been checked or audited except as to specific items, and as to the period preceding June 30, 1911, there is only the guess that it is as found by the Mayes, of whom it is established that they only completely checked the District general fund.

To arrive at the conclusions presented by the majority it was compelled to violate the ordinary canons of construction in construing the acts of Congress, and to disregard the directions of the act of June 29, 1922, under which it was supposed to act.

In arriving at its conclusions the majority omitted from consideration the following items for the Government:

One-half of the 5-20 bonds.

One-half of the interest on the 5-20 bonds.

Interest on all items of advances or credits upon which interest has not been paid. One-half of the fines of the police court for the Government. One-half of the $5,000 appropriation to buy land for the National Training School for Girls, which, it seems, has been expended but no land bought. One-half of the salaries of Army officers who work only for the District. And for the District the majority omitted the following items:

One-half of the fines and fees in the Supreme Court of the

One-half of the unlawfully paid premiums on the 3.65 bonds. Interest on these items, not to mention the millions referred to by the District auditor and Mr. Colladay, the representative of the Joint Citizens' Association.

To the above there should be added whatever changes an audit of all other matters not audited might disclose. interest item alone on known changes shows a credit to the United States of $1,691,889.93, as shown by the majority report.

The 5-20 bonds show a credit of over a million for the Government, and interest from the dates of payment should be

There are many other items not included in the foregoing which are known to a limited number of persons, which, when properly inquired into, will doubtless disclose other large sums that have gone from the Treasury to the benefit of the District.

It is not amiss to call attention to Congress to the conclusion of some Members of the majority embodied in their report:

"Some members of the committee believe that these laws, although binding, were in many instances more favorable to the District than they should have been if due consideration had been given to the taxpayers of the United States, and that under these laws the United States has for a long time and is now contributing more than its just proportion to the administration of the District government and the upkeep of the District; and that this is especially true when consideration is given to the limited activities and interest of the United States in the District, which are not wholly maintained at the expense of the United States, as compared to the large, expansive, and growing interests of the residents of the District or those owning property therein, and taking into consideration also the low tax rate paid on property located in the District."

when this was incorporated as a part of the report.

It is assumed that it is the views of at least three of the majority, or else it would not have been made a part of the report. If this surmise is correct, then there is a clear majority of the committee, who, if the facts as to how the legislation as to failure to collect interest and as to the payment of the 5-20 bonds are as is stated herein, will logically come to the conclusion that at least the sums representing the interest which was not collected and the portion of the 5-20 bonds and interest thereon paid by the Government, with interest on these amounts as directed in the act of June 29, 1922, ought to be deducted from the surplus as found by the majority.

The minority views as herein presented do not intend to suggest a balance or surplus for or against either the District or the Government, as in the time permitted, from February 4, 1922, to the present, even a cursory examination of appropriations and accounts was impossible.

It must be conceded that without a complete checking and auditing of all items which may enter into the fiscal relations between the District and the Government there can be no true balance.

In conclusion, it should be observed that the balance for the District may be either more or less than suggested by the majority, or there may be no surplus at all.

That the fact sought for may be satisfactorily settled there should be nothing left in doubt that can be made certain. With millions in doubt on either side of the accounts and not inquired into at all, a balance or surplus based upon a careful audit of all items and a careful digest of congressional action in connection with those items must be the only proper solution of the problem which will insure accuracy, do justice, and lay, so far as it is possible to satisfy, the various contentions.

To this end it is recommended that the committee be continued, with the directions to thoroughly audit all the matters between the District and the Government, including the interest on all items upon which it has not been charged, and to ascertain and report to Congress what sums have been expended by the United States and by the District of Columbia, respectively, whether for the purpose of maintaining, upbuilding, or beautifying the said District, or for the purpose of conducting its government or its governmental activities and agencies, or for the furnishing of conveniences, comforts, and necessities to the people of said District, all as directed by the act of June 29, 1922, and that such additional appropriation may be made as may be necessary to carry out these instructions.

Respectfully submitted.

ROBERT E. EVANS, Of the Committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand that the majority of the committee have reached a situation now where they are willing to work on Sunday in order to help the farmer?

Mr. MONDELL. I think both the minority and the majority are of a mind on that matter.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Ramseyer] and the statement he received permission to insert in the Record, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record in 8-point type by inserting therein an address by Merton L. Lewis, former attorney general of the State of New York, on the railroad problem.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The address is as follows:

Address of Gen. Merton E. Lewis, Formerly Senator and Attornet General of the State of New York, Before Washington Board of Trade, January 18, 1923.

"There is probably no subject engaging public attention at the present time more important than the subject upon which I am asked to speak to you to-night.

"The danger of an interruption of interstate commerce is so threatening, not only to the commercial rehabilitation of our country and to a considerable extent the rehabilitation of the world, but also so full of possibilities of actual physical suffering by the helpless and innocent bystanders and outsiders, that the attention of every thoughtful mind is almost inevitably directed to a study of the problem and an effort to find a remedy.

"First, as to the problem.

"Here in America we boast of our freedom. In no country in which there is an established government is the individual so free to pursue his own course, so little hampered by the interference of government, as in these United States of America.

When we consider the conditions which exist here and which are guaranteed to us by the Constitution under which we live. we are not surprised that our country has grown from a feeble Confederation of 13 Independent Colonies as they existed at the close of the Revolutionary War to the great continent-wide Nation of more than a hundred million people, which has recently demobilized an army which numbered nearly, if not quite, five millions of men wearing our uniform and marching and fighting under our flag.

Having in mind the advantages guaranteed to us by our form of government and the development which has resulted from such advantages, it would be surprising had we not been able to raise the armies which we did raise and to send those armies to the fields of France there to break the Hindenburg line previously believed to be unbreakable.

"It would have been surprising had we not been able to send across the seas the bread and beef and cotton and wool with which to feed and clothe the slowly starving people of England, France, Italy, and other European countries.

"It would have been surprising had we not been able to loan billions of dollars to the countries of Europe, whose financial resources had been exhausted in the effort to preserve themselves from destruction as independent self-governing

"In a word, it would have been surprising had we not been able to win the war which, until we took up the task, England, France, Russia, Italy, Serbia, and their allies had not succeeded

We won because we had, under our form of government, learned to love liberty; because we hated tyranny; because we could not tolerate the upbuilding in Europe of a military power which we knew would sooner or later force us to fight to prevent the destruction of our liberties and our right to maintain ourselves as a free people.

We had the ability to win because of the wonderful growth of our population, the development of our natural resources, of our population, the development of our natural resources, the great wealth which we had accumulated, the love of freedom and justice in the hearts of our people, and the willingness on the part of our people to sacrifice when sacrifice seemed necessary in what we believed to be a righteous cause.

"This freedom, of which I have spoken, has, I think, in these more recent days, come to have a meaning in the minds of many which if conceded to a right to be subversive.

of many which, if conceded to exist, is likely to be subversive, if not absolutely destructive, of our institutions.

Men say, and are not often contradicted, that they have the right to work when they please and to cease to work when they please. To an extent this is true. As a broad general proposition it should not be true, even if it is true now. I do not mean by this expression of my opinion to indicate that I believe in industrial slavery or peonage, or any-thing of that character. I do not. What I do mean is this— that our civilization has become so complex, our industries so diversified, our activities so dependent upon the activities of others, that no single individual, no body of individuals, has under present conditions the right to cease to function as a part of the system under which we have grown great and powerful and wealthy.

"A hundred years ago men, as a rule, were independent of each other to a much greater extent than now. The farmer, for instance, generally speaking, was able to produce practically everything required for the support and upbringing of his family He produced the meat and bread, the vegetables and butter, the milk and cheese, the wool and the flax required to feed and clothe his family. A coal strike would not have affected him, for the reason that he had an ample supply of firewood. A railroad strike would not have disturbed him, for the reason that his horses were ready and able to haul him and his family

A strike of longshoremen did not bother him, as he had no merchandise for export. The doctor had his own horse and chaise and traveled about among his patients and needed no other kind of transportation. There were no steamships rushing across the ocean, here to-day and in Plymouth or Brest within a week. There were no railroads by the use of which you could spend the business hours of to-day in your New York office and the business hours of to-morrow in Chicago. There were no telegraph lines, or telephones by the use of which we could talk with our agents or associates in San Francisco.

"All these modern inventions and modern methods have served to destroy the independence of the individual and to create instead a dependence upon others. We are dependent for our bread not only upon the farmer who grows the wheat, but upon the miller who grinds it, the baker who bakes the bread, and the grower who delivers it at our doors; for our meat upon the packers who slaughter our cattle, the railroads which transport the meat, and the distributor who distributes it; for our milk upon the farmer who produces it, the railroad which brings it, oftentimes from far distant points, to our cities, the plant where it is pasteurized, and the driver who leaves the bottles on our doorsteps while we are still asleep.

"A strike of the men who dig the coal makes it impossible frequently for the miller to grind the wheat. Without coal he frequently is without steam. The same strike makes it impossible for the railroads to take the wheat to the mills or the flour to the baker

"The same strike makes our cities dark at night, because without coal we are without electricity; without electricity our surface cars cease operating, and our subway systems are silent, our telegraph and telephone lines are out of commission.

"Because of this complexity of modern conditions we as individuals have lost much of our former independence. We have become more dependent than ever before. None of us is independent—neither the rich man nor the poor man. The coal strike puts us all out of business. A railroad strike is just as bad. A strike of the longshoremen in New York recently resulted in the total destruction of hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of foodstuffs. This destruction necessarily added to the already too high cost of living.
"A steel strike a few years ago resulted, according to the newspapers, in a loss of more than a quarter of a billion dollars. The railroad shopmen's strike last July resulted in a loss, the amount of which can not be even estimated with any degree of accuracy.

"Individuals employed in the coal mines, upon the railroads, in the factories, in the mills, or in any industry which contributes to the production of the necessaries of life claim, and their claim has not been generally disputed, that they have the right to cease working whenever they may choose to do so. Not only this, they claim that they have a right to form organizations of workers and to agree that they will cease their labors at any time they may choose and for any cause which may seem to them to be good. They claim that the public has not the right to interfere; that the law does not give the public the right. Some will claim that the lawmakers have not the power to make any law which will give the public the right to interfere. I am not one of those who are willing to admit such claim.

"Self-preservation is said to be the first law of nature. It is true, however, not only as to individuals but it is equally true as to governments and nations. There is a considerable element in favor of the proposition for a general strike. By this it is understood that all workers in all organized industries shall cease on a given date to perform their allotted tasks to contribute their proportionate share to the maintenance of the existence of the human race. I deny this right. I insist that it is within the power of the Government of the United States to pass such laws as may be necessary to prevent strikes and to prevent the stopping of the wheels of industry.

"This is not my own individual and unsupported statement. I find my authority in the Constitution of the United States and in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. I marvel at the wisdom of the group of men who gathered together more than 130 years ago and immortalized themselves by the publication of the greatest, the most profound, and wisest secular document ever written by human hand-the Constitution of the United States.

"The Constitution makers declared in Article I, section 8. subdivision 3, that the Congress shall have power 'to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.' The words 'to regulate' have been and must be construed to mean the power to take such action as shall prevent interference with interstate commerce.

"There is scarcely a railroad in the country of any consequence not engaged in interstate commerce. Any attempt to interfere with the orderly operation of the railroad is an attempt to interfere with interstate commerce. The miner who refuses to mine the coal necessary for the generation of steam to drive the locomotives which haul the wheat to the mill in a State other than that in which it is grown interferes with interstate commerce. The engineer who refuses to drive the locomotive which hauls the cars from the farm to the mill and from the mill to the market interferes with interstate commerce. The longshoreman who refuses to load or unload the freight delivered at the seaport from States in which it originated interferes with interstate commerce. The telephone or telegraph operator who refuses to operate a line extending from one State into another for the transmission of messages relating to interstate commerce himself interferes with interstate commerce.

"These interferences have generally heretofore been regarded as nonpreventable. We have felt, and perhaps many of us still feel, that liberty of individual action is of the highest importance, and that such liberty must be maintained, regardless of consequences. The time is coming, and if I am not greatly mistaken is near at hand, when liberty of individual action will to a considerable extent necessarily be surrendered by those who enter into the employment of corporations, railroads, and other public service corporations.

"The sooner such laws are passed as will prevent such interferences the sooner we shall reach that state of industrial development which will make it certain that our country will continue to be the most powerful and our people the most wealthy on the

"The situation is one which can easily be corrected. gress has the power. If there is to be any difficulty at all, it will be a difficulty which will arise when the effort is made to induce Congress to exercise the power. Labor organizations control votes. Votes control elections. A statement appeared recently in one of the daily papers to the effect that not more than 3 per cent of the total population of the country are members of labor organizations. Whether this is true or not I do not know. What we do know is that labor is organized. All railroad labor is unionized. The power of the unions must not be underestimated.

"In a recent decision of the United States district court, in the case of Scott v. Frazier (258 Fed. 675), that court recognized the necessity of a change of remedies to meet changed conditions. In that case the court said:

"" What may be done by the State to protect its people and promote their welfare can not be declared by a priori reasoning. New evils arise as the result of changing conditions. If the State remains static, while the evils that afflict society are changing and dynamic, the State soon becomes wholly inadequate to protect the public. The State must be as free to change its remedies as the evils that cause human suffering are to change their forms. change their forms.'

"That the power to meet such changing conditions does exist and can be exercised has been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States. I think that all of us remember—and some of us shudder when we think of it—that in 1916 a strike was threatened by the four railroad brotherhoods. Had the strike been carried into effect it is probable that every locomotive in the United States would have been put out of commission. The members of the brotherhoods demanded what in effect amounted to a very large increase in wages.

"Alarmed by the threat, the President insisted that Congress grant such demands. The Adamson law was enacted and soon thereafter became the subject of judicial interpretation. The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States was written by Chief Justice White and is found in volume 243 of the United States Supreme Court Reports. At page 348 he said:

"'If acts which, if done, would interrupt, if not destroy, interstate commerce may be by anticipation legislatively prevented, by the same token the power to regulate may be exercised to guard against the cessation of interstate commerce threatened by a failure of employers and employees to agree as to the standard of wages, such standard being an essential prerequisite to the uninterrupted flow of interstate commerce.

"At page 350 Judge White said:
"'Again, what purpose would be subserved by all the regulations established to secure the enjoyment by the public of an efficient and reasonable service, if there was no power in government to prevent all service from being destroyed?' (Italics ours.)

"At page 352 Judge White said:

"'Here again it is obvious that what we have previously said is applicable and decisive, since whatever would be the right of an employee engaged in a private business to demand such wages as he desires, to leave the employment if he does not get them and by concert of action to agree with others to leave upon the same condition, such rights are necessarily subject to limitations when employment is accepted in a business charged with a public interest and as to which the power to regulate commerce possessed by Congress applied.'

"Judge White said that the power exists, and may be exercised by the employer and the employee to agree upon a standard of wages, but he said:

"'That right in no way affects the lawmaking power to prosect the public right, and create a standard of wages resulting from a dispute as to wages and a failure therefore to establish, by consent, a standard.' (Italics ours.)

"Mr. Justice McKenna, in his concurring opinion, page 364,

"When one enters into interstate commerce one enters into a service in which the public has an interest and subjects one's self to its behest * * *.' (Italics ours.)

son case says, pages 364-65:

I am not prepared to deny to Congress, in view of its constitutional authority to regulate commerce among the States, the right to fix by lawful enactment the wages to be paid to those engaged in such commerce in the operation of trains carrying passengers and freight. While the railroads of the country are privately owned they are engaged in a public service, and because of that fact are subject in a large measure to governmental control.'

"With the authority which we find in the Constitution, con-strued as it has been by the highest court in the land, we are bound to ask ourselves this question: Does a government function properly which fails to realize the danger of the situation which confronts the people of the United States?

"The great public interests involved furnish more than sufficient reason for the exercise of the power by Congress which the Constitution, as we have seen, confers upon that body. When the people of the United States shall come to a full realization of the fact that the power exists, then will come the demand that Congress perform its full duty to its constituents.

"Now, as to the remedy.

"We have seen from the quotations from the opinions of the judges of the Supreme Court that the power does exist; that Congress can enact laws which will operate to prevent inter-ruption of interstate commerce. Such a law should provide that any person entering the employ of a public-service corporation or of any corporation charged with a public interest should be required by law to sign a written contract; that such contract should specifically provide that under no circumstances should a strike take place.
"The Interstate Commerce Commission has complete power to limit and restrict the amount that a railroad company engaged in interstate commerce may charge for the transportation of persons or property. The determinations of the commission have the force of law. The exercise of such power as is com-monly applied amounts to a limitation upon the income of the company.

"Congress should confer upon the commission the power to regulate and limit the expenditures of the company in carrying on its operations. If the outflow from the spigot be greater than the inflow at the bung, the barrel is soon empty.

Under present conditions expenditures for operating costswages of employees-are regulated, if at all, by the brother-They determine for themselves the amount of wages for which they will exchange their services. If the members were engaged in private employment, in an employment not charged with a public interest, their right so to do could not be questioned. Being employed by an interstate commerce carrier. they should by the terms of a written contract be required to agree that during the term specified in such contract they would not leave such employment except with the consent of the employer.

"If there is any one thing more than another upon which the stability of human affairs depends, it is, I think, the inviolability of contracts.

The peace of the world is preserved by contracts between Such contracts are known as treaties. nations.

The most devastating and costly war in history resulted from the violation of a contract-a mere scrap of paper which was torn and cast to the winds.

"A glance at the present condition of what but a few years ago was the great German Empire should cause every nation, every government, every group of individuals, every human being to pause whenever tempted to follow the example of the German chancellor in the summer of 1914.

"The peace of the world depends upon the observance of treaties.

"The Constitution of the United States is but a contract entered into by the States in 1787, and later accepted by other States.

"An attempt by a group of States in 1861 to nullify the contract to which they had become parties resulted in a war more costly than any which had preceded it.

"Substantially all human relations are governed by contracts, either express or implied. The purchase of a loaf of bread, a cigar, a newspaper, each involves a contract. There is first an agreement as to the price. The contract is completed when the price is paid and the loaf is delivered. The baker, however, in selling the loaf, warrants impliedly that it is wholesome and fit for consumption. For a breach of such warranty he is liable to the purchaser for any damage that may be sustained by such

"The borrower of a $10 bill contracts to repay it. For his breach the lender has his remedy. A telegraph company is liable to the sender of a telegram for its failure to deliver or for unreasonable delay in the delivery of such message. A man who marries a woman contracts to support and maintain her and to support, maintain, and educate the children resulting from such marriage. A corporation chartered by the State is bound by its charter. It contracts to do those things and may only do those things which its charter permits it to do, and for a breach of its contract may lose its charter.

"A railroad corporation, by the acceptance of its charter, contracts to transport persons and property. It must perform its obligations or cease to exist. The State which grants the charfer may take it away. The charter is granted because the public interest is served by the creation of the corporation. It is, therefore, the duty of the corporation to function normally and effectively. It must do the work for the doing of which it was created. It can not cease to function at its pleasure. It must carry on. The public interest requires that there be no interruption in the performance of its obligations.

"Every prudent business man anticipates his normal business requirements and his probable future needs in the way of machinery and materials. It is not unusual for an individual engaged in a business enterprise to contract in advance for his supply of labor. It is only prudent that he should do so. This is, it would seem, particularly true as to railroad corporations.

"It is undoubtedly the practice of all railroad corporations to contract in advance for their supply of coal and their other necessaries.

"The one thing for which they do not contract effectively is for a supply of labor. Without skilled labor a railroad corporation can not render service. The service which a railroad is required to render is a public service. It is a service in which the public has an interest. For that reason governmental control to the extent necessary for the protection of the interest of the public is hardly debatable.

"As to railroads engaged in interstate commerce, the Interstate Commerce Commission has the power to regulate the operations within the limits fixed by Congress.

"Congress has such power under the commerce clause of the It has exercised its power and has conferred Constitution. power upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to establish rates for the transportation of passengers and property. Such rates when established are binding upon the corporations. It is unlawful for a railroad corporation to charge a different rate for service than that established by the commission. A violation by a railroad corporation is punishable in the Federal courts. The power of the courts to punish is nowhere questioned.

"As a result of the exercise by the commission of the power which it possesses, reasonable rates only are charged and collected. The income of the companies is limited by the determinations of the commission.

"The operating costs, however, are not limited. No commission or board has power to determine costs of operation and enforce its rulings.

"Railroads, therefore, are compelled to pay such wages to the skilled laborers as such laborers may demand. The result of a refusal to pay the wages demanded is an interruption or re-Either is disastrous to the public and disduction of service. astrous to those whose capital is invested in the securities of the corporations.

"Skilled labor necessary for the operation of the roads is highly organized. The demand is always for an increase in It is not a question of bargaining. It is not a question in the labor or going without it. The railroads must of taking the labor or going without it, have it. They can not operate without it.

"An individual or a corporation about to construct a factory or a dwelling house may employ labor, or if the cost of labor is too great, may postpone such construction. A railroad corporation has no such choice. A railroad corporation must furnish constant, uninterrupted service. An interruption means congestion. Congestion means destruction of property. Food-stuffs, such as meat, milk, fruit, vegetables, quickly become valueless if allowed to stand in cars on the sidings for lack of switchmen or engineers to move the cars.

"Railroad employees organized as they now are have not only the railroads of the Nation but millions of consumers of the great cities at their mercy.

"Not alone the consumers but the producers are compelled to The farmers of California, it is said, sustained a loss

In the event of a strike, railroads may have no engineers. As a result they can not move the cars. The Interstate Commerce Commission can render no assistance. It has no power. There is but one course open and that is to pay the wages demanded by the engineers.

"For the prevention of strikes, strikes should be made not to declare it to be unlawful for railroad employees to engage in a strike. There are hundreds of thousands of such employees. They are everywhere. If even a few thousand of such employees were to defy the courts and flout the law, what would happen? There are not enough courts in the whole country to deal with the situation. The fails of the country could not hold those who might be found guilty.

"In the meantime, what happens? The employees have violated the law and have voluntarily ceased to render service. They are now in a position to claim that they have the right under a statute to leave their jobs when they please for any reason or for no reason whatever, and they always will have that right until a complete change of conditions shall be brought about.

"The employees may cease to operate the roads at any time. When they cease, the train service is suspended, business is interrupted, traffic is dead, meat, milk, fruit, vegetables, and merchandise of all kinds are either ruined or damaged.

"Either the railroad companies must make good to the shippers or the shippers must stand the loss themselves.

"Congress has the power to apply the remedy. It may require railroad companies to adopt the prudent course and to employ its engineers and firemen and other classes of employees for fixed and definite terms, to be specified in written contracts, to be negotiated by themselves with the companies, with the assistance of the Interstate Commerce Commission, at wages satisfactory to themselves and the companies and approved by the commission. The commission should supervise the matter of employment and determine the form of the contract. It should be declared unlawful for a railroad corporation to employ any person in the operation of a road except under the terms of such contract.

"The proposition has been advanced to declare an agree ment between two or more employees to leave the service with intent to hinder or delay interstate commerce to be unlawful.

"Merely declaring a thing unlawful does not prevent crime. "Only a minor fraction of those who are daily guilty of unlawful acts are ever arrested. Only a minor fraction of those who are arrested and charged with having committed unlawful acts are ever convicted.

"It is unlawful to expectorate on the sidewalks. In New York it is unlawful to smoke in the subway.

"It is unlawful to charge usurious rates of interest.

"It is unlawful to drive an automobile at a speed greater than 20 miles an hour on city streets.

'It is unlawful in a public place to pour a drink of whisky from a flask into a glass.

"Not many years ago innocent-minded legislators in New York enacted one of the Ten Commandments into statute law. Who ever heard of a conviction under that statute?

"How many respectable citizens would be able to plead not guilty to a charge of violating the Volstead law?

"Many prohibited acts are committed because such acts are not of themselves immoral.

"A man who could not be induced to pick another man's pocket would not hesitate to buy a case of whisky from a boot-legger.

Frequently at dinners which I have attended I have noticed men at the tables who at the time were public officers, and as such must necessarily have taken the constitutional oath of office, who had no hesitation in drinking alcoholic beverages, which they knew had not been lawfully obtained for the occasion.

We are rapidly becoming a Nation of lawbreakers. Because acts which are not immoral have been declared to be unlawful.

"Government by injunction is unpopular, and whenever possible should be avoided.

"A statute providing that two or more persons who might agree to leave the service of an interstate-commerce railroad with the intent to interrupt commerce would be difficult of enforcement except by injunction-as difficult as is the enforcement of the Volstead law.

"A just and fair agreement between employer and employee, reduced to writing, with the assistance and under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, would appeal to The rights of all parties would be thorall fair-minded men. of $25,000,000 as a result of the railroad strike of last summer, loughly understood. Dissension would cease. Harmony would prevail. Interruption in the transportation of persons and property would no longer be likely. The danger of loss and damage to property would not continue as a menace to the shipper, and industrial unrest throughout the country would soon become a matter of history.

"No question of involuntary servitude is involved. No man could be compelled to enter into such a contract. Every individual would be free to exercise his own judgment in the matter. He could sign or refuse to sign.

"Substantial penalties should be imposed. Violations of contractual obligations or of the statutory provisions should be made punishable by imprisonment. Employees found to be guilty of violating a contract or any provision of the statute should be disqualified from entering into the employ of a publicservice corporation for a period of time to be fixed in the act, and the court should have the power to appoint a receiver for any corporation found to be guilty of any such violation.

"Hon. Newton D. Baker, recently Secretary of War, in an article published in the American Bar Association for December, 1922, speaking of the brotherhoods composed of railroad employees, said:

"'The strength of these bodies of workers is such that the fundamental industries of transportation in this country could not operate a day against the combined action of the brotherhoods, and the life of our large cities and industrial centers depends in a thousand ways for its productivity and prosperity upon the determinations of the organized industrial crafts.

"'Few of us realize, I am sure, that organized labor has become not only a powerful factor in the daily industry of the country but a great physical power. The check-off imposed in the soft-coal mines of the central competitive district is estimated to produce $15,000,000 a year. The annual receipts of the railroad brotherhoods are probably an equal amount, while into the treasury of the national and international craft organizations and of the Federation of Labor an amount estimated at $60,000,000 is annually gathered. They are strong enough, in fact, to carry on wars.'
"Further on in the same article Mr. Baker said, speaking of strikes and the conditions resulting therefrom:

"'It is sometimes difficult to tell who starts the conflagration and riots. The armies face one another at close range and the sentinels on both sides are jumpy. The result, however, is that any dispassionate description of American labor relations to-day would be obliged to conclude that they are frankly anarchistic appeals to brute force, restrained only by prudential considerations and wholly untamed by the ordinary moralities.

"In the same article Mr. Baker said:

"'It must be recognized, first, that there are three parties to every labor controversy—the employer, the employee, and the public. Second, it must be recognized that this public interest can not be left to be injured or destroyed by prolonged conflict between the other two parties or disregarded by both when they combine against it. Recognizing these two principles as fundamental, we ought to be able to devise industrial arrangements under which the grave problems * * * will be studied and solved. Such questions are real and vital to the worker. They are equally real and vital to the employer, and wherever they are left unsolved the public finally pays the bill.'

"Hon. Ben W. Hooper, chairman of the Railroad Labor Board, in an article published in the Saturday Evening Post of October 14, 1922, said:

"'In most of the national conventions of railway employees this year strong ground has been taken in favor of the repeal of the labor article of the transportation act, and it goes without saying that any move to strengthen the act by the inclusion of an antistrike provision will be vigorously resisted. The employees demand the unhampered right to tie up the railroads whenever they consider it to their own interests. The basic reason of this is twofold: First, because they believe that their absolute power to throttle traffic will get them more than arbitration will; and, second, because the majority of them are advocates of Government ownership, and they believe that their unrestricted power to strike will soon force a discouraged and disgruntled public to adopt Government ownership. Their first conclusion is erroneous. * * * Their second conclusion is correct.'

"The concluding paragraph of Mr. Hooper's article reads as follows:

"'Our people should not temporize with this question. It is "'The transportation act of 1920 was a long stride in the right direction. Results have justified its enactment but uncovered its fatal weakness. Its provisions should be clarified where necessary to the safeguarding of the rights of all concerned, and, above all, they should be made mandatory and enforceable. Then, if abuses develop in the administration of the law, let the ballot box be resorted to for redress,

"'This is a problem that can not be solved by stagnant hesitation or timid retrogression. It calls for a forward movement.'

PART OF ADDRESS OF REPRESENTATIVE JOHN PHILIP HILL AT THE WASHINCTON EIRTHDAY DINNER OF THE DEPARTMENT OF MARYLAND, VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS, IN HONOR OF THE NATIONAL COMMANDER IN CHIEF, AT THE HOTEL RENNERT, THURSDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 22, 1923.

One hundred and twenty-six years ago General Washington delivered his farewell address as President to the people of the United States. This morning, in accordance with time-honored custom, this address was read in the House of Representatives.

As we meet to-night to celebrate the birthday of General Washington it is particularly appropriate that we consider some of the very wise recommendations which he made to the American people for their guidance, based upon the varied experiences of his life as the great military commander who achieved their liberties and as their first guidance, based upon the varied experiences of his life as the great military commander who achieved their liberties and as their first Chief Magistrate.

It is particularly appropriate that you who have served this country in its foreign wars should consider the great teachings contained in Washington's farewell message, not so much for your own guidance, but for transmission to those who directly or indirectly are responsible for the political destinies of this country. You have made me your toastmaster this evening, and I have therefore all the time at my disposal, but I shall only reserve for myself three minutes, and in that time I shall call your attention to one special piece of wisdom from Washington's Farewell Address. This great civilian soldier, who had helped formulate the Constitution and who had for eight years executed the laws made under that Constitution, said:

"The basis of our political system is the right of the people to make and alter their constitutions of government."

Then, having exhorted the people to stand by existing laws, he referred to the fundamental structure and theory of our libert and said:

Then, having exhorted the people to stand by existing laws, he referred to the fundamental structure and theory of our liberties and said:

"One method of assault may be to effect in the forms of the Constitution alterations which will impair the energy of the system and thus to undermine what can not be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of Government as of other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country; that facility in changes upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion; and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests, in a country so extensive as ours, a Government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable."

In these days when we are testing the radical alteration of the theory of our Government contained in the eighteenth amendment, and when there are being proposed to us that by other amendments to the Constitution the United States take control of marriage and divorce, of child labor, and such matters it behooves us to remember these farewell words of the first President.

by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Wason.
Rev. William D. Waller, of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

With reverence we draw nigh to Thee, O God, to Thee in whom we live and move and have our being.

Bless us in our service this morning. May we gather inspiration from the lives of those whom we remember to-day. We beseech Thee to sustain and bless their families and dear ones. And as our friends go out into the unseen world, so teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.

Make us all thy willing and faithful servants, that when we are summoned to give account of the deeds done in the body Thou mayst say to each: Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

Bless our President and Congress, and all in authority in our own land and in all lands, that Christ's kingdom of righteousness and justice, of good will and brotherly kindness, may speedily cover all the earth, and all the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ, and to His name shall be the glory forever. The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FESS assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, we are assembled to-day for the purpose of doing honor to the life, character, and memory of our friend and colleague, Sherman Everett Burroughs, who died in Washington, D. C., Saturday night, January 27 last.

The deceased was born in the town of Dunbarton, N. H., February 6, 1870. His early boyhood days were spent upon a rugged hillside farm. He was educated in the district school and later graduated from the high school of Concord, N. H. He then entered Dartmouth College and graduated in the class of 1894 with a degree of bachelor of arts. During vacations from school he worked earnestly, and materially earned money to aid in obtaining his education. By early environment he incul-cated the habits of industry and responsibility, which were sup-plemented by earnest and faithful study. When he had completed his education and entered upon the stage of early manhood he was well equipped for a useful life.

After completing his course in Dartmouth College he received After completing his course in Dartmouth College he received the appointment as private secretary to Hon. Henry M. Baker, then a Member of Congress representing the second congressional district of New Hampshire. He remained with the Congressman until the spring of 1897. During this period of time Mr. Burroughs, in addition to his work as secretary, attended the Columbian University Law School in Washington, D. C., graduating therefrom with a degree of master of law in 1897. He then returned to his native State, was admitted to the bar, and began the practice of law in Manchester, where he practiced his profession and resided until his death.

Soon after entering the practice of his chosen profession he became a member of a successful law firm of that city, and was one of its active members in the preparation, trial, and management of their cases. Mr. Burroughs was regarded as one of our able lawyers and jurists and enjoyed the confidence and respect of all persons who knew him. He was also regarded as one of the substantial and influential citizens of his native State. Outside of his profession he was active in civic and political organizations. He served as a member of the House of Representatives of New Hampshire for the session of 1901-2; served as a member of the State board of charities and corrections from 1901 to 1917, inclusive; he served as a member of the State board of equalization in 1910; and in every one of those positions he measured up to the requirements thereof and discharged the duties with ability and distinction.

For 20 years he was active as a jurist in the practice of his profession, and during that same period of time in his activities in legislation and in civic affairs of the State he became well acquainted with the needs and problems of all classes of our citizenship and won their confidence and esteem.

He was known as an earnest, modest, upright, honest, and capable man who enjoyed good fellowship, and good fellowship enjoyed him.

When a vacancy occurred in the Sixty-fifth Congress by death, it was natural and logical that the people of the first congressional district turned toward him and honored him by an election to fill the vacancy.

During his first term-in the Sixty-fifth Congressassigned to membership of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries; in the Sixty-sixth Congress he was assigned to membership on three additional committees-Education, Revision of the Laws, and Woman Suffrage; in the Sixtyseventh Congress he was assigned to membership on the important Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, releasing his positions on all his former committees. He refused to be a candidate for the nomination of Representative to the Sixty-eighth Congress. Thus it will be noticed during the six years of his service in this House he was assigned to duties on some of its most important committees.

In this broader field of activity and responsibilities we found a man well equipped for the task before him. His gentle manner, his modest demeanor, his considerate treatment of his col-leagues, his fidelity, and his intellectual power early aroused confidence and won for him the respect of all who came in close association with him. We all realized his sincere thought and candor, his modesty and ability, and we all appreciated his advice and opinion. We noticed that he was reserved about becoming too confidential with his associates, but after sufficient close association and acquaintance he wisely learned who was entitled to freely share his confidence. He was patient and logical in forming his opinions; the reached conclusions after careful and comprehensive study and consideration, which were predicated upon keen analysis, earnest thought, steadfastness of purpose, and when he had reached a conclusion he would retain it unshaken. With sincerity born of conviction, he impressed it upon the minds of his associates. Having once taken his position on an issue, he was as firm as the granite hills themselves to the cause which he advocated and espoused; he could not be swerved or moved from that position. He was rather conservative until he was convinced that a new proposition possessed merit and would be beneficial to the people as a whole. He never was a demagogue; he never heeded the appeal of propaganda. He never strived for headlines in the public press. He possessed a sincere contempt for the superficial and the sensational, which seeks publicity, void of merit, and gives the impression to the public of a character which does not exist in fact. He believed and acted upon the principle that character discloses what man really is, and by that standard his life, his accomplishments, and his reputation should be measured and determined. He was a sincere man. No duplicity existed in his life at any period; he never swerved from the right as he saw the right; he stood firmly where his clear and comprehensive judgment directed him to stand. When he gave his support to a cause he became an active and faithful soldier to the end. In every position in life, in public affairs or private, he discharged the duties thereof with modesty, courage, ability, and

We mourn the loss of a trusted associate, stricken in the full vigor of life, when for him there seemed to be many years of useful service. Citizen, able jurist, statesman, husband, father, friend, colleague, the record is well written and on memory's altar will ever glow a wealth of love and affection for one who through life was loyal to home and country and measured up to the full stature of man.

In his death, or transfer to the other life, which never ends, his devoted wife and four sons, his aged father, brothers, and sisters, his neighbors, his business associates, the people of his congressional district and his native State, mourn his sudden departure, and as the days pass will miss his counselorship and his influence for right. His sincere and cheerful greetings to his colleagues will never be extended to those of us who remain on earth. We shall miss his statesmanship, his patriotism, his loyal and sincere love for country and her traditions. Our sorrow and affliction, aroused by his sudden demise, is tempered and softened by the consciousness that he has entered that life that never ends, where sorrow is unknown, and his legacy to us to remember him by is a model life, which was symbolic of a true Christian man.

And when the twilight hour drew near, He stood beside the silent sea; And in his heart there was no fear Of all its dread immensity.

He waited there in perfect faith, And while the fading day grew dim, The boatman's hail, the voyage of death, Meant only going home to him.

Mr. Speaker, I close by reading an editorial of merit, published in the Manchester Union, Monday morning, the 29th day of January, 1923, touching the life and character of Sher-MAN E. BURROUGHS:

published in the Manchester Union, Monday morning, the 29th day of January, 1923, touching the life and character of Sherman E. Burroughs:

For the life of Sherman E. Burroughs was life in the true sense of the word, life grounded upon principle, life organized into character, the life of a unified personality equipped with moral standards, intellectual integrity, and a sense of direction. And it is to his life that we must go if we are to have and hold clearly this view of him—not to his sayings about himself—for, although many of us have heard him speak in public many times, and have engaged in private or group conversations with him, who ever heard him talk about his personal ideals of private or public conduct? He lived his theory of life.

And at the core of this life, a heritage from the pioneer stock, the Puritan stock if you please, was a living, rich feeling for the right. This is not to suggest even remotely the idea of infallibility of judgment. It is simply to point out that when confronted with the necessity for decision he approached his goal not over the route of expediency but over that of oughness. And once what seemed to him to be the right course of action had been decided upon, he set his face like a flint and put himself into the doing of the right with vigor, a combativeness, and a tenacity which only action could bring out from under the urbane exterior of the man.

The outstanding case in point was his decision to remain in the contest for the congressional nomination on his prohibition platform. The present writer stood near him when group after group of professional and amateur politicians in his own party approached him at his headquarters on the night before the convention with pleas that he withdraw in order to avert just what, as a matter of fact, after wards occurred within the Republican Party here in Manchester. A decision to seek the nomination on the following day as a prohibition candidate meant that in 10 minutes his headquarters would be deserted. Yet he hesitated not a sec

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, we meet to-day to pay tribute to four of our beloved colleagues who have passed beyond the Great Divide. They were all friends of mine, as they were friends of yours, and they represented ably, faithfully, and conscientiously constituencies throughout this great land of As representing in part one of the New England Statesthe oldest New England State-I count it a privilege to say just a word or two in regard to our friend and colleague, Sherman E. Burroughs, of New Hampshire.

Mr. Burroughs exhibited in his life and public service those outstanding characteristics of the founders of New England, which have made such a valuable and lasting contribution to the life of this great Republic.

Like those early founders, Sherman Burroughs was a deeply religious man and he recognized that great truth pointed out in the Farewell Address of the Father of his Country, which was read to us here a few days ago-that morality is the real foundation stone of a nation, and that morality can not permanently exist without organized religion. Our friend and colleague was deeply religious, and throughout his life he was a faithful and devoted member of one of the great historic branches of the Christian Church. Best of all, however, what he professed with his lips he practiced in his life and in his dealings with his fellow men.

Like those early founders of New England, he brought over from his religion three great ideas which he applied to everyday The first of these was the priceless value of the individual soul, and because of that idea he was a believer in and a defender of the constitution of his State and of the Constitution of the United States, both of which guarantee to every citizen, no matter how humble, protection to his life, his liberty, and his property, not only against the wrongful acts of other citizens but even against the abuse of power by the Government itself.

In the second place, he brought over from his religion and lived in his life the great ideal of real democracy. With him artificial classes and distinctions among men did not count. You and I have known him, and you know, as I know, that the proper test with him of a man's worth was his character, and not his wealth, family, or outward appearance.

Lastly, he brought over from his deep religious belief the idea of service—constant, faithful, and devoted service to his family, to his city, to his State, and to the Nation. His whole life was a life of service, and he has left behind him a splendid example of Christian manhood that can never die, but which will live forever.

He has passed on. He has left us for a time. He has fought a good fight; he has finished his course; he has kept the faith; and we know that there is laid up for him a crown of glory in the life beyond the grave. We do not simply think, but we know that what we call death is not the end but the beginning of life. The great truth of immortality is taught in the animate and inanimate world of nature all around us. if we will but heed the lesson. But, in addition, divine reve-lation teaches us that we are always in the keeping of the great Creator of the universe, our Heavenly Father, who doeth all things well. And as we meet here upon this occasion tinged with sadness let us comfort our sorrow and strengthen our faith by repeating those beautiful and inspiring words of that grand old New England poet, John Greenleaf Whittier:

Within the maddening maze of things, And tossed by storm and flood, To one fixed stake my spirit clings, I know that God is good.

I long for household voices gone, For vanished smiles I long, But God hath led my dear ones on And He can do no wrong.

I know not what the future hath Of marvel and supprise; Assured alone that life and death His mercy underlies.

And if my heart and flesh are weak To bear an untried pain, The bruised reed He will not break But strengthen and sustain.

And so beside the silent sea I wait with muffled oar; No harm from Him can come to me On ocean or on shore.

I know not where His islands lift Their fronded palms in air; I only know I can not drift Beyond His love and care.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I feel that my own life has been enriched by having the close friendship and close association of Sherman E. Burroughs. He was a man of unusual ability, and his ability was keenly appreciated by those closely associated with him. He was exceedingly modest and reserved.

I served on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with him during all the time that he was on that committee, and in committee he took a more active part in the discussions than on the floor. He never participated, however, unless he had something valuable to contribute. The members of the committee soon understood this and gave closer attention to what he said. He did not speak frequently on the floor of the House, although such remarks as were made by him showed careful study and comprehensive understanding of the subject and contributed to a correct solution of the problem. He was rather slow to reach a determination upon any impor-tant question, but once that determination was reached he rarely shifted his position.

His attitude on the bonus measure, his firm stand for a strong and adequate Navy, are illustrative of this trait in his character. A New Hampshire newspaper, in discussing this phase of his character in an editorial recently, said:

This is not to suggest even remotely the idea of infallibility of judgment. It is simply to point out that when confronted with the necessity for decision he approached his goal not over the route of expediency but over that of oughtness. And once what seemed to him to be the right course of action had been decided upon, he set his face like a filnt and put himself into the doing of the right, with a vigor, a combativeness, and a tenacity which only action could bring out from under the urbane exterior of the man.

The outstanding case in point was his decision to remain in the contest for the congressional nomination on his prohibition platform. The present writer stood near him when group after group of professional and amateur politicians in his own party approached him at his headquarters on the night before the convention with pleas that he withdraw in order to avert just what, as a matter of fact, afterwards occurred within the Republican Party here in Manchester. A decision to seek the nomination on the following day as a prohibition candidate meant that in 10 minutes his headquarters would be deserted. Yet he hesitated not a second. The situation offered no problem for him whatever. As he saw it, there was one right thing to do; and heredity, habit, and character drove him straight to his mark without the least evidence of effort. We think this was characteristic.

SHERMAN E. BURROUGHS had a keen intellect. After obtaining the education offered by the common schools of Dunbarton and Bow he took the high-school course at Concord, graduating with the closs of 1890. In 1888 in competitive examination for a West Point cadetship he won highest rank and was appointed by Congressman J. H. Gallinger. Owing to the wishes of pointed by Congressman J. H. Gallinger. Owing to the wishes of his parents he declined this appointment, and in the autumn of 1890 entered Dartmouth College, graduating in 1894 with the degree of bachelor of arts. In his sophomore year he took what is known as the second "Thayer prize" for proficiency in mathematics, and in his senior year the "Rollins and Nettleton prize" in oratory. He also took honors at the end of the sophomore year for high standing in the prescribed Greek course, and in his senior year for standing in philosophy. After graduation he was offered the position of instructor in his alma mater. his alma mater.

Declining this offer he became private secretary to Congressman H. M. Baker, of the second New Hampshire district, and spent the three years next following in Washington, D. C., where he attended the law school of the Columbian University (now George Washington University). Here he received the degree of bachelor of laws in 1896 and the degree of master of laws in 1897. He was admitted to the bar of the District of Columbia in July, 1896, and to the New Hampshire bar in July, 1897, and in August of that year opened an office in Manchester, N. H., and began the practice of his profession.

Mr. Burroughs came to the Congress with experience as a legislator, since he had been a member of the State Legislature of New Hampshire. Although not an offensive partisan, he was an ardent Republican. He was active in both State and National political campaigns from 1896 to the time of his death. His service in Congress was during the most trying times in the last half century. Coming in just after the declaration of war he had to decide upon all the questions of great import which confronted the Congress during the prosecution of the war, and the questions of even greater import which confronted the Congress in the aftermath of that great world tragedy. He had earned his rest. Though our hearts are sorrowful, we shall not continue to mourn, but shall rather be happy to know that Divine Providence gave to America the services of this great and good man.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, this occasion affords a fitting opportunity for some of the friends and colleagues of the late the Hon. Sherman Everett Burroughs to indicate, in a brief way, the esteem and love in which they held him. Before his illness had become known to his associates, death came to him and with it came grief and mourning to all who knew him.

Mr. Burroughs was a native and typical product of the New England country where he had always lived, and he inherited and developed with great pride the traditions of his ancestry and surroundings. In the institutions of his neighborhood he received his common school and collegiate education and practiced his profession of law. He was a worthy, beloved, and competent representative of the New England standard and ideals. Due to his inheritance and environment, he respected the virtues and substantial qualities of others, and by his own exemplification of such he was entitled to and received the full respect of all those whose good fortune it was to know him or to know of him.

The worth of an individual is probably best attested by the evidence of value set upon him by his neighbors, who always have the best opportunity to measure his qualifications as contrasted with those of others in the same community.

Mr. Burroughs's selection as a member of the New Hampshire Legislature and various local and State bodies devoted to the public service, his election and reelections to the House of Representatives of the United States Congress, and the many other honors paid him by his fellow citizens, indicate more forcibly than I can by mere words his real accomplishments.

It is perhaps, after all, most fitting that, in the brief time allowed to me in these exercises, I make mention of Mr. Burroughs as a Member of the United States Congress, as in such capacity I came to know him and so established an acquaintance which later developed into a warm, personal, and intimate friendship. Beyond this, it has been my pleasure during the past two years to be very closely associated with him in the work of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Commit-

No member of the committee was more dependable in the execution of his duties or more keenly interested in the work of the committee than was Mr. Burroughs. He was prompt in his attendance at our meetings, always interested in the subject matters and questions before us during sessions, and studious in respect of these matters outside of the committee room.

Mr. Burroughs was not of the demonstrative type. He was, however, thoughtful, frank, and judicial. He was a man of an inquiring mind, and he went to the bottom of things and followed every discussion through with a view to determining what the results would probably be in the event of the passage of legislation which may have been under consideration. He was highly conscientious and had real convictions and always the courage of such. These several characteristics and qualifications contributed to make him a strong and helpful associate and a loyal coworker and supporter. At no time was Mr. Burroughs a mere opportunist. He was ever courageous enough to risk, maybe, a temporary disapproval of others if, in the expression of his point of view or by his action as a legislator, it became necessary for him to proceed along lines not for the moment popular.

All summed up, I gladly declare that Sherman Everett BURROUGHS was a man in the best sense. He was a man by virtue of his courage and fine qualities, marked peculiarly by moderation, charity, and belief in his fellow man. It must be that the hereafter will furnish for him a proper reward. To his friends he has left a beautiful memory; to his loving and devoted wife, a recollection of a happy and devoted association; and to his fine boys, a record of real accomplishments and a well-established, enviable family name, which he, in his all too short life, maintained and to which he contributed additional luster and strength.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, those who knew Sherman E. Burroughs in the intimacy of family and social life will retain a picture of him and his many excellencies that for natural reasons is denied to most of us associated with him in the work of the Government. Whosoever is thus privileged to have memories of the unofficial man will cherish them all the more warmly because of the man he was.

However, to those of us who saw him day by day in his un-remitting labors on the hill there remains a remembrance not the less pleasant or inspiring. It is that of a sturdy, wholesome character of old-fashioned stability and dependability, firm and unyielding in matters of conscience and principle, but none the less gracious and tolerant and altogether kindly in such a resolute attitude. It is that of one who goes about the every-day duties of his position with a modest, unassertive manner that is none the less firm and determined than it is modest and unassertive, meeting with tact and smiling good will opposition here and there maybe, and sometimes battling rather strenuously for the prevalence of ideas. But always maintaining a serenity and broad-minded tolerance that were conspicuous in an atmosphere so full of eternal controversy.

SHERMAN E. BURROUGHS all unconsciously set for his colleagues an example of quiet, conscientious devotion to duty, that made their labors with him all the more comfortable and quickened and that now make their memories of him all the more sweet and inspiring.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Speaker, I became acquainted with Mr. Burroughs shortly after his coming to Congress six years ago. However, it was only after I became a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which Mr. Burroughs was a member, that I learned to know him and gain a knowledge of his life. The more intimate opportunity I had of learning of his qualities during the last two years' prompts me to desire to express my friendship for him and an appreciation of his character and worth.

In discussing Mr. Burroughs with a colleague some time before his death I made the remark that he could justly be classified as belonging to the highest type of men in Congress. I believe that all familiar with his character and qualities as a man and as a legislator will concede that our public life has been enriched by the participation of Mr. Burroughs.

After having concluded to pay this tribute to his memory and meditating upon his qualities I reviewed some of the speeches of Mr. Burroughs in the Congressional Record to see if they corroborated my judgment as to the high qualities I have attributed to him. A review of these speeches fully confirmed the opinion that I entertained with less scrutiny of his congressional career.

The man who spends a few years in Congress and to a reasonable degree participates in its debates leaves an unfailing index to his character, ability, sincerity, and usefulness as a legislator. Mr. Burroughs has left a record that speaks for him after he is gone, and speaks in terms that are entirely creditable to his memory. His record is free of demagoguery and insincerity that too frequently characterizes our public men. The Congressional Record furnishes imperishable evidence of the logical, candid, considerate mind of Mr. Burroughs, as well as his moral qualities, innately just, courageous, and, if need be, self-sacrificing. He brought to the public service a sincere, searching, and judicial mind. He brought to the public service a conscientious sense of duty and responsibility. Though what may be called a party man, he can never be charged as belonging to that class of public servants who look upon public questions as only party questions and see in them only an opportunity to serve party advantage or embarrass an opposing party. By instinct, training, and disposition the questions of Government were primarily problems to him to which he devoted his service for solution, seeking primarily the public good.

To his friends Mr. Burroughs has left the memory of a clean, wholesome, sincere, and likable personality. To his wife and children he has left the sad, sweet memory of a husband and father, in which they can find much of consolation, much for emulation, and much to be cherished in pride and gratitude. To his country he gave a useful and intelligent service.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker-

O, though oft depressed and lonely, All my fears are laid aside, If I but remember only Such as these have lived and died.

I first met Sherman Burroughs in the National House of Representatives a few days after we had declared war against Germany. Our first meeting ripened into a delightful friendship. I found him finely and efficiently equipped for his duties in Congress. A man of noble bearing, of the rugged New England type, a refined personality, a stainless character, and a lover of truth, honesty, sobriety, purity, and justice.

During his six years in Congress he represented his people and the Nation in a most faithful and satisfactory manner. A prompt and constant attendant upon his committees and at the sessions of the House. He had in his work in Congress nothing of the spectacular. He never sought to obtain large He never sought to obtain large headlines in the sensational press. He had no radical changes to be made in the Constitution of the United States. He was never the follower or slave of any special class or interest. He did not represent any radical bloc or organization that would revolutionize the Government. He seldom spoke in debate, but when he did he showed a detailed and careful knowledge of his subject and commanded always the closest attention of his fellow Members. He had at all times the respect and confidence of the House of Representatives. Everyone was his friend and he was the friend of all he ever met. was afways a true patriot and statesman. His loss will be felt deeply by the friends of good government everywhere.

Shortly before the last primary in his State he had decided not to be a candidate for reelection. He talked with me frankly and freely of his plans and of his future. He loved his work at the National Capital, but felt, as many Congressmen feel, that with no income but the meager salary given to us he could not educate his children and lay up anything for old age.

He had left, when he came to Congress, a prosperous law practice, and his old partners were constantly insisting that he come back to his first love—the practice of law in his native city—and he looked forward with great pleasure to the 4th of March when he should resume again that most congenial employment and make for himself a more prominent position at the bar of his home State. Alas for those day dreams,

We press too close in church and mart To keep a dream or grave apart. I went with him to New Hampshire in the political campaigns of 1918 and 1920. I rode with him many days and nights over the beautiful highways and across the sublime mountains of that wonderful New England State. I met with him the people who sent him to Washington and whom he so faithfully served. They loved and trusted him. They welcomed him to their homes and listened with rapt attention to his plain and honest words, words that awakened anew in their souls greater patriotism and finer resolves to perform their whole duty as citizens of this Republic.

I went with him again to New Hampshire only a few days ago—I as a member of the congressional funeral delegation, he on the same train covered with flowers. I was with him on the arrival of that train in the old home church in his native city, there where his neighbors and friends, an almost endless procession, crowded each other to gaze with sorrow upon his still.

We tremble by the harmless bed
Of one loved and departed.
Our tears drop on the lids that said
Last night, "Be stronger hearted."
O God, to clasp those fingers close,
And yet to feel so lonely;
To see a light upon such brows,
Which is the daylight only;
Be pittful, O God!

What a mystery is life. We can not understand it. A little child falling asleep in death among his toys is the occasion of sorrow. The aged reaper found dead among his gathered sheaves fills many lives with sadness; but the strong man, in the noontime of life, with a brilliant future before him, life's great tasks and plans all uncompleted—for him to fall, this is the greatest mystery and tragedy of life.

O too swift runner, Death, Couldst thou not wait for me a little space, And I had done thy bidding?

I do not believe that this cold, dear, dead face, this coffined form, these uncompleted tasks, these fond duties, these pleasant anticipations, end with the life of Sherman Burroughs. Somewhere, somehow, in a fairer clime, in a better and eternal world the broken threads of life unite and friends and loved ones shall see him once again.

SHERMAN BURROUGHS was a man of faith. He had no fear of death. He calmly entered the boat that sailed away from this shore and was lost from human sight. There will be no return voyage. His trust was in God, and therefore he could at all times say with Whittier-

And so beside the silent sea I wait the muffled oar, No harm from Him can come to me On ocean or on shore.

I know not where His islands lift Their fronded palms in air, I only know I can not drift Beyond His love and care.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, life is a mysterious thing. Out of what world it comes, whither it departs, is the abiding problem. I would not philosophize nor indulge in platitudes; but when we contemplate the little space of our mortal existence, the flying years, the end that hastens toward us, we are moved to often question whether it is all worth while. If it were to serve merely the physical ends of our existence, the necessity of human life might well be doubted. But if, as I thoroughly believe to be true, it is to achieve some high purpose of the Creator, then it is well for mankind to be born, to struggle, to have the urge of ambition, to achieve, and to die. To work for the purpose of making mankind better, that is worth doing; to take an honorable and useful part in the affairs of one's country and one's people is a worthy reason for existence. There are no regrets or misgivings about a life spent in useful, helpful effort. There need be no tears because of the death of the man who has done all he can in his sphere of action to advance mankind. More than this no man, even though he may be a Cæsar, can do.

This much our late colleague Sherman E. Burroughs did. His life was useful and exemplary. Coming from humble surroundings, by his own untiring efforts and with indefatigable industry he educated himself and rose to a position of high trust and responsibility among has fellows.

His life was not one of ease but one filled with effort and striving and contest with difficulties. From these things he made of himself what we, his colleagues, found him to be, a high-minded, courageous, clear thinking, and capable public officer and man.

I first met our late colleague in the early summer of 1917, when he came to fill a vacancy caused by the death of Hon. Cyrus A.

Sulloway. I had filed on a vacant room in the House Office He being my junior was afterwards, by error of the custodian, alloted the room. He discovered the error in some way and came at once to me, insisting that I take the room, and expressing the greatest regret. I was deeply impressed by his apparent sincerity and, above all, by his gentility and courtesy. The impression I formed then was never dissipated by any subsequent conduct of his. I never knew a man who had more of the instincts of a true gentleman than did Sherman E. Bur-ROUGHS. I know that the opinion I had of him was also shared by all who knew him in the House. Whatever criticisms may be willfully made of the House of Representatives of the United States, one thing can be said, that there is no place in our great American Republic where true ability and worth is more highly regarded or where work and diligence bring greater recog-The general esteem of the membership of the House is only obtained by virtue of superior attainments or person-That Mr. Burroughs had such qualities is best evidenced by the fact that everyone here who knew him had the same high appreciation of him and was glad to call him a friend.

And I am sure these same quiet, courteous, high-minded, gentlemanly qualities of his were qualities with which his people were well acquainted. I could not help thinking of this as, in the church at Manchester, I stood near his coffin and watched the silent procession of his friends and neighbors who had gathered to pay their last respects to their Representative who had come home to lay his body with those of his forbears, in the shadow of the granite hills of his own New Hampshire. These quiet, sane, ordinarily undemonstrative people gave clear and unmistakable evidence that they knew they had lost a worthy Representative in the councils of the Nation, a decent and upright citizen, and aye, more than that, a good and steadfast

For two years I have served with him on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the House. The jurisdiction of that committee is very broad and it has many complicated legal questions to deal with. Mr. Burroughs was not one of those who frequently took the time of the committee in its many discussions. But one thing we, his colleagues, soon learned, and that was that when he offered any suggestion it had merit and substance in it. His arguments were terse and clear, his knowledge of the principles of law great, and his judgment conservative, sane, and sound. Such a man, so endowed by the Creator with a pleasing personality and possessing knowledge and understanding of a high character, could not fail to be a valued member of society.

There is not a great deal one can say on such an occasion as this. About all we can do is to briefly express our regard for the departed and bid him farewell. But I can not let this occasion pass without expressing my regret at his passing. He had years of useful effort ahead of him when the grim reaper came. But, brief though it was, his life was a success, measured by every rule. It was full of effort and accomplishment, and was helpful to humanity. And when our hour comes, my friends, what better thing can be said of us than We have given our late colleague back to the soil that bore him, but it is my sincere hope that the years to come may bring from the hills and valleys of old New England into the councils of the Nation many another man like Sherman E.

BURROUGHS.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Speaker, the death of Sherman Bur-ROUGHS brought to everyone who knew him well a sense of deep personal loss. Some of his colleagues here who to-day pay tribute to his memory knew him much longer than I had the privilege of knowing him, but when the word came that he had gone I felt that I had lost a friend. For such a loss we are never prepared. For among the gracious gifts of Providence what richer gift is there than the gift of friend-

For nearly four years I have known SHERMAN BURROUGHS, and day after day during the past two years I have sat by his side on the committee of which we were members. Day by day that association ripened an acquaintance into friendship. To have known him is a privilege which I shall ever remember in gratitude, and the memory of him will abide with me through the years.

He was clear in his thinking, high in his purposes, fair in his contentions, careful and sound in his judgments, scholarly and chaste in his utterances. And then I can not think of him without having leap at once to my thought the word "gentleman." Sherman Burroughs was a gentleman. And by that term I do not have in mind the mere trappings of conventional manner, but I have in mind those deeper, finer qualities of mind and heart which give pervading dignity to manhood. I mean that he was kind and considerate and generous and clothed withal in that courtliness of bearing which lent peculiar charm to his personality.

We live and die in a world that we do not understand. wisdom of man has made its conquests, but wherever we look upon the changing panorama of the world we behold a mystery. In earth and sky and sea, in every dawn and every nightfall, in the prophecy of every springtime and the fruition of every harvest, in leaf and flower and crystal-always and everywhere the note and the breath of mystery. And greater than this mystery of the world around us is the mystery of the world within us. More compelling than the mystery of what we see is the mystery of what we are. The mystery of thought, the mystery of love, the ever-surging mystery of life, and the ever-saddening mystery of death.

At the meridian of his powers our colleague and friend took his departure from fireside and forum. Why a thing like this should be we do not know-it belongs to the endless mysteries of life. But somehow we know that in the economy of the universe and the endless years it must be well. Christian faith must speak and give meaning to these fleeting days of life and take from death its blighting tragedy. Somewhere there must be kingdom where life's deeper meanings are revealed, life's injustices corrected, life's inequalities lev-

It must be so in a land of far horizons and cloudless skies. Now we see through a glass darkly, but then face to face.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, there are few associations in life that bind us closer in the bonds of friendship than those formed during our earlier years, and on the opening of the Sixty-fifth Congress I was greatly pleased to meet as a new Member my old college friend, Hon. Sherman E. Burnoughs, of New Hampshire, to honor whose memory we are assembled this Sabbath day. I soon discovered that the nobility of his soul and the excellence of his character which had won the admiration and love of his college associates were still his strongest characteristics. After our graduation he returned to his home State and I cast my fortune with the then new State of Idaho, and it was indeed most delightful to meet him here and to talk over with him the associations and incidents which we had enjoyed together during the years we were in college, and to relate some of our experiences which had occurred since we separated 20 years ago. It was a great disappointment to me to learn from his own lips during the last session that he would not be a candidate for reelection. I little thought then that he would not live to finish his term in the Sixty-seventh Congress.

Congressman Burroughs was a man who knew how to love and appreciate his friends. He was one who dared to maintain the right and condemn the wrong. He was a ripe scholar and a profound thinker, and his heart was as great as his mind. His geniality and sociability made him friends everywhere, and he was always ready to manifest his friendship and sympathy for the people, regardless of their station in life. The leaders in Congress very soon discovered that Mr. Burroughs's splendid scholastic attainments, his legal learning, his broad, comprehensive knowledge of men and affairs, together with his industry and determination to study the important legislative problems which come up so rapidly and so continuously, qualified him for membership on the most desirable committees; and, while under the rule of seniority he had to await his turn, he finally attained his ambition by being appointed to membership on what is considered by many the most important and influential committee in the House-Interstate and Foreign Commerce. His reports from the committees on which he served show most careful study and a wide knowledge of the subject, and his speeches and debates demonstrated his ripe legal learning and the unusual ability of being able to attract and retain the attention of the House membership.

It is impossible for us to understand why such a man should be called in the prime of life, but we bow in humility to the plans of an all-wise Creator, knowing that the time of our going across the Great Divide is not of so much importance as how we have lived during the span of life allotted to us. Truly our late colleague has wrought well and his service to his State and the country will be held in grateful remembrance by the people of the great Commonwealth he so ably represented in the various positions which he filled with such fidelity and distinction.

Our late colleague was a devoted husband and was always ready to make any sacrifice for the comfort and pleasure of his life companion. To his children he was not only a kind and indulgent father but a companion to whom they could go for counsel and in whom they could confide with an assurance of sympathy in all their trials and difficulties.

I can not say, I will not say,
That he is dead. He is only away.
With a cherry smile and a wave of the hand,
He has wandered into an unknown land
And left us dreaming. How very fair
It needs must be, since he lingers there.

Mr. WASON resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, one of the important compensations of service in this House is that it brings Members into association with each other, thereby giving opportunity for the forming of friendships. Fortunately, this opportunity is improved by most of us. Service on the same committees brings us into even closer contact with each other, while living in the same Washington hotel is probably the best means of all for becoming well acquainted with each other. I did not have either of the latter privileges for closer association with the friend whose life, character, and public services are commemorated here to-day. There were, however, so many points of common interest between him and myself that we were not long in finding common ground whereon a real and permanent friendship grew up which lasted till he passed away

SHERMAN EVERETT BURROUGHS was born February 6, 1870. At that time I was but a tiny child; so that we were very close to each other in age. He graduated from Dartmouth just three years after I had graduated from Yale. We both studied law and were admitted to the bar about the same time. He lived in New Hampshire and I in the neighboring State of Connecticut. We both went to the legislatures of our respective I preceded him in coming to Congress by only a few years. He surpassed me by only one in the size of our respec-Our respective private fortunes were approxitive families. mately equally limited when by coming to Congress we gave up opportunity for increasing them. All of these added to our common zeal for the public service soon brought us to know each other, and with knowledge came sincere and lasting

The education, training, and experience of Mr. Burroughs, based upon fine native ability and a charming personality, fitted him for what he came—an ideal Member of Congress, He greatly respected the wishes of his constituents and strove manfully to carry out those wishes, so far as he could do so without doing violence to his own best judgment as to what was right and best; but no fear of political or personal consequences to himself ever swerved him from what his own best judgment approved.

Early in the present Congress when there was not a cloud in the political sky Mr. Burroughs announced his determination to retire from Congress at the close of the term for which he had been so recently elected. It was not because he had grown tired of his service here. In fact, it was known that he regretted that what seemed to him a plain duty required him to make the decision. He loved his family and felt his responsibility in that direction very keenly. It was not possible when he was first elected, in the very early days of the war, to foresee what would happen to the cost of living. No one could have foretold that living costs would substantially double within the After the most mature deliberation short space of four years. he decided that he must retire from Congress in order that he might fulfill what he deemed a more sacred obligation due to those whom he loved so much.

The decision of Mr. Burroughs to leave Congress just as he was reaching the period of most effective service is one that should cause those of us who are left here, as well as the people generally, to stop and think seriously. He was still a comparatively young man. He was at that time apparently in perfect health. He liked the work and was well adapted to it. theless, in order to meet his responsibility as a man of a family, he felt it to be his duty to seek in private life a more nearly adequate financial reward for his services so that he might be able to lay by something for possible emergencies. The pay of a Member of Congress is inadequate. The loss of such men as Mr. Burroughs from Congress on this account is a distinct loss to the whole country. The loss of a few such men-and they are retiring every year for the same reason-would far and away overbalance the small amount saved by the penny-wise and pound-foolish policy now being followed.

Alas, for the plans of mortals! It was not permitted to our friend to meet in the way he had planned the responsibility he had felt so keenly. He gave freely the sacrifice of a notable public service, but it was not to be his lot to reap the rewards which his fine abilities would have doubtless brought to him in the field of private endeavor.

The death of Mr. Burroughs in the prime of mature manhood and at the height of his powers for usefulness was a great shock to all of us. It most forcibly reminds us, and we need be often so reminded, of the solemn fact that we are mortal, that life is fleeting, and that at best the days in which we may serve our country and our fellows are few. As we recall the strong and manly life of our departed friend, filled with deeds of usefulness, it should be an inspiration helping us to seize the passing hours and make them count for the things worth while.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, after listening to the many utterances in respect to our departed brother, I can only add a word of tribute, for it would be needless to repeat the many things that have been said.

I knew Mr. Burroughs before he came to Congress, although I had never met him. It was on the occasion of a special election due to the death of his predecessor that my attention was called to the type of man Mr. Burroughs was. When he reached here we who had been interested in the result of the contest were ready to properly appraise his ability as it was represented to us. I was associated immediately with him on committees, and on the committee of which I happened to be chairman he was one of the most devoted members

If we measure success in life by the highest standard, it will not consist in years of life but, rather, in deeds accomplished, and, measuring by that standard, I think all who knew Mr. Burroughs will admit that he was an eminently successful man; successful at home as a business man, as a professional man, and added to that success his achievement in public service in his own State, not only by the tenure of office determined by election but also by appointment. Added to that, it seems to me, the one thing that would impress us most is his appreclation of what a citizen should be in not only his individual community but in his family.

It has been my great pleasure to be at his home in Manchester. There in the midst of his family can be found the explanation of the great claim he has on the hosts of friends and his country. I had the great pleasure of going throughout his district only a short while ago, where I learned to know how his neighbors respected him; how there was such a universal admiration from the business management of the great concerns equally with marked respect of the workmen in the great concerns through which I went with him as we passed from place to place, giving me the best opportunity of seeing how he was regarded at his home. When he came to Congress he at once took high position as a man of counsel among his col-leagues. He promised a brilliant career had he decided to remain any length of time. But this decision was not to be. Having served his Nation here in three Congresses, he felt his duty in another direction. I was really shocked to be told by him that he was not going to remain in Congress, that he had fully made up his mind not to return.

I talked with him here within the Chamber and asked him why that decision, as I knew he liked the service in the House, was greatly admired at home, and could remain as long as he cared to do so. Then he told me confidentially what our friend and colleague, the gentleman from Connecticut, has just now That is a situation that impressed me most of all reneated

He said:

I owe it to my family. I have lived here during these sessions of Congress and have served my country as best I can, but I owe it to my family of boys; while two of them are fixed in their life work, placed in the work they have prepared themselves to do, I have still one in a university that must be seen through his university work, and I also have a younger son that is to be looked after. I must give some attention to my family.

That is a magnificent manifestation of the type of citizen that America owes the most to. I want to drop a word of tribute to him and say that I know of no one who knew him that disliked him or took exception to his course, but, on the other hand, everybody who has known him speaks of him in the terms of the greatest devotion to what is best in life, and with a deep admiration for his general character-it matters not whether it was in the business circle or professional circle, in one section of the State or another. It is universal appreciation from all those who knew him. He has passed from among us. family is bereft at the very moment he had decided to give up public service in order that he could give more attention to his loved ones. Language is futile to assuage the grief which has overtaken them, and yet he had completed a life short in years but wonderfully powerful in success. I believe that Sherman E. BURROUGHS represented the finest type of American citizenship.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker and colleagues, there is little left to be said where so many abler men have spoken who have known our late colleague so much longer than it was my privilege to have known him. However, I want to say just a word of personal appreciation of his friend-ship during the time that I have served in the House of Representatives. I first became acquainted with Sherman E. Burroughs in the year 1919. I had been asked to serve upon the Committee on Naval Expenditures. We were conducting Mr. Burroughs appeared before our committee. Something had been done to a young man in his district which did not appear right to him and which upon the face appeared to be very unjust. He felt called upon to present the matter to the committee. While knowing him before, this was my first real acquaintance with him.

I was impressed at the time not only with his engaging personality, tact, courtesy, and knowledge of the law but his very keen sense of justice. This was accompanied by the willingness to put forth all his powers against an injustice. He there plead that justice be done this young man. This was my first acquaintance with him. Then the Sixty-sixth Congress came to a close and it was my privilege to be appointed to serve on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. As we know, this committee is practically in session almost every morning while Congress is in session. Mr. Burroughs was one of those who were practically always there, unless there was something most important to carry him away. His services in the committee exhibited a trait which we all would do well to emulate. He liked to work, to serve for the pleasure of service. Committee work is not spectacular. The public knows little about it. But we all know it is the work that counts. Invariably we benefited in listening to his wise counsel. He talked when there was occasion for it and all listened. He himself was the best of listeners. When he announced his retirement from Congress every one of us deeply regretted it. He talked to me about it upon a number of occasions, giving his reasons for leaving here. Others have referred to them. There is no necessity of my repeating them.

SHERMAN BURROUGHS loved his work here and would have liked to continue it. He also loved the law and enjoyed the practice of this the noblest of professions. While I was at Manchester it was my privilege to talk with one of his partners. He had been looking forward to his coming home again to take up the burdens of the practice of the law in the city and State, and expressed to me the loss that he and his associates had sustained.

One could see, as we made our way into the church, that those who came to pay tribute to Sherman Burroughs were men who had held the highest positions in the State, and also those who occupied the more humble positions in life. No better tribute could be paid than that. As I look back over his life I am reminded of the words of the Master when he said:

If any man serve me, him will my Father honor.

SHERMAN BURROUGHS'S whole life from boyhood until mature manhood was a life of service-service to the family, service to the community, service to the State, service to the Nation-and while the body has passed away, the Sherman Burroughs that we knew, the one whom we loved and called colleague and listened to his counsel, his life has not gone out, but it has passed into another room and still lives as an example to us to lead us on to a better and more complete life of service.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, some men draw attention to themselves by performances that are always audible and visible, akin to the blare of trumpets and the glare of jewels, while others attract their fellows by a quiet, invisible, and inaudible but none the less irresistible force, akin to that of the magnetic pole. Of the latter class was our late colleague, the Hon. SHERMAN E. BURROUGHS, of New Hampshire. I first met him in the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of this House after my assignment to that committee at the opening of the Sixty-sixth Congress. And the fact that I am the only member of that committee to say a word about him is my excuse for taking time now. I learned to know and love and esteem him to the same extent as also did the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce who have spoken here. He was affable, genial, kindly, and helpful to the stranger. He was steadfast and loyal to his friends, among whom I subse-He quently deemed it a high privilege to count myself. He was industrious, painstaking, and thorough. He was one of those valuable members of a legislative body who do not try to express immature views on all subjects but who reserve their energy and influence for the matters upon which they are adequately informed. He made few speeches on the floor of the House, but he worked faithfully and assiduously in committee and followed with close attention all the proceedings of the House. His judgment was sound, his reasoning was logical, and his conclusions were dependable. He was the soul of honor. His heart and his mind worked together in a common impulse for the right. Many men have altogether honorable intentions. but lack the intellectual force to withstand temptation and blandishment. Not so with our late colleague from New Hampshire. He had moral courage and mental stamina. He not only saw the right, he did it. He not only felt the right, he lived it. With all of his colleagues I mourn his passing and revere his memory. A life such as his is an inspiration to his family, his friends, and to the Nation.

THE LATE HON. NESTOR MONTOYA.

Mr. THOMPSON took the chair. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. Thompson, by unanimous consent— Ordered, That Sunday, February 25, 1923, be set apart for ad-dresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. NESTOR MONTOYA, late a Representative from the State of New Mexico.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House Resolution 560.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. Nestor Montova, late a Member of this House from the State of New Mexico. Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of the exercises of the day, shall stand adjourned. adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved. That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The question was taken, and the resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, Nestor Montoya was born at Albuquerque, N. Mex., April 14, 1853. He was essentially a product of the great Southwest. His training prior to his coming to Congress had fitted him for legislative duties. had had experience in both branches of his State legislature and had long been connected with public life in his native State, New Mexico. He knew the needs of his State and the wishes of his people probably as well as any man who ever did while serving his first term in Congress. He was, therefore, well fitted for the responsibilities that came to him at the beginning of the Sixty-seventh Congress.

Descended from a family of the Spanish-speaking race but who have always been loyal to the United States, he was himself noted in his State for his loyalty to the traditions and institutions of our country. He spoke both the Spanish and English language fluently. He was educated in a college of English language fluently. He was educated in a college of his native State. During the late World War he devoted much of his time, means, and energy in war activities. Two of his sons and a son-in-law served with the American Expeditionary Forces overseas. I noticed in front of the courthouse in his home county a large stone bearing the names of those in his county who served in the World War. It was a source of pride to our departed comrade that he was largely instrumental in having this stone placed.

Knowing the people among whom he spent his life and in a measure acquainted even with sentiments of his own heart by reason of frequent conversations, I am reminded of the words of the poet:

For mankind are one in spirit, and an instinct bears along Round the earth's electric circle the swift flash of right or wrong. Whether conscious or unconscious, yet humanity's vast frame, Through its ocean-sundered fibers, feels the gush of joy or shame. In the gain or loss of one race all the races have equal claim.

We entered Congress together. He was not frequently prominent on the floor of the House of Representatives, but he was wise in shaping legislation in committee. He attended closely to all the requests of his constituents, usually going in person to the departments to attend to all matters of important business. I mentioned this to him one day in conversation and he replied by saying:

During all my life, when a responsibility has rested upon me, or a duty has been assigned, I like to see personally that service is rendered in the best possible way.

This was characteristic of Nestor Montoya's life.

He went to his reward while still strong but with his work just finished. The poet has said: "There is no death, what seems so is transition," yet we marvel sometimes at the change we call death which comes so quickly and unexpectedly. Death seems to be calling, even waiting at the door. It is the only thing of which we are absolutely sure. The high, the low, the rich, the poor, must go the way of all the earth. It is great to so live that it can be truthfully said of one that the world is better for one having lived in it. Surely this may be said of our comrade in whose memory we now meet.

We took him back to the land of sunshine, of clear skies, and laid him down for his last sleep near the Rio Grande, the river he loved so well. Amid scenes of beauty and serenity and among the people whom he loved so well his funeral was conducted. The mighty throng that attended was the greatest evidence of the esteem and affection in which he was held that could possibly have been given. It was said that the funeral was the largest ever held in New Mexico.

While he was greatly honored and respected by his friends, of course he was leved most and will be missed most by his own family. I noticed especially the evidence of deep devotion on the part of his wife and five children. Nothing can take away entirely the sorrow they bear, but the consolation of a life well spent is in a large measure a balm for a broken heart. The day we laid him to rest the wife and her children gave all that was mortal of their husband and father, but they will retain forever the real essence of his being, that which is immortal.

God bless the memory of this good man; this modest, dignified citizen; capable, patriotic, conscientious public official.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, from my acquaintance with NESTOR MONTONA here in Washington and from the information and observation gotten while attending his funeral and mixing with the people of his city and State, I am definitely impressed with two things in his life and character.

First, he was a man who went quietly forward and met his responsibilities and his work honestly, without pretense of affectation. There was nothing theatrical or self-conscious about him. I think it well worth while to call attention to this admirable trait. Too often we think of the average politician as a man who likes to bask in publicity and strut before admiring throngs. I think I may venture to mention this, Mr. Speaker, because I myself did not become a "politician" until I was pretty well beyond the meridian of life. Since coming to Washington I have been impressed that the average Member of this House is not a vain seeker after the baubles of popularity. He is an honest, hard-working Representative of his people, seeking what he believes to be best for them and their country, much more courageous than we occasionally believe, even in the face of the well-nigh irresistible inertia of public affairs which makes a treadmill of his life.

And yet when we look back on the finished life of a man like our late colleague we realize that it is not purely a treadmill.

Why, all men strive, and who succeeds? All labor, yet no less Bear up beneath their unsuccess.
Look at the end of work, contrast
The petty done, the undone vast.

And yet-

Our times are in His hand-Who saith, "A whole I planned, Youth shows but half; trust God; see all, Nor be afraid."

It is in a life such as NESTOR MONTOYA's that we begin to see the whole and begin to realize that the real effective things are done much as the temple of Solomon was built, without The man who is doing an important work sound of hammer.

has neither time nor taste for the blare of trumpets.

The second thing with which I have been impressed is that NESTOR MONTOYA was a man who loved his fellow men and who in return was loved by them. Those of us who accompanied his remains to his home city and attended his funeral had this borne in upon us unmistakably. I myself once lived for some years among those sturdy westerners. They may have the natural faults of their rugged, progressive existence, but whatever these faults may be, they are not hypocrites. They are real; they "speak right on" and they go straight forward. One is not left in doubt as to what they think of men, measures, doctrines, or propositions. In this honest western atmosphere NESTOR MONTOYA had been born and educated, and had come to manhood and attained distinguished position.

Here, after he was gone, we saw demonstrations of love, confidence, and admiration from men and women of every rank and race. There were Indians and Mexicans, there was the old Spanish aristocracy, and there were business and professional men who had come from every part of the Union to that thriv-ing metropolis of the great Southwest. All alike came to do honor to the memory of their distinguished fellow citizen and to express their grief at his taking away.

The State legislature was in session at ancient Santa Fe. From there came a large delegation of lawmakers. who bears the distinction of having been the first governor of the State of New Mexico delivered in Spanish a beautiful address expressive of the sorrow and admiration of his people. A distinguished lawyer and public official represented both the bar and the public. And the learned and pious priest gave a fervent funeral address, following the mass in the old church built more than two centuries ago.

But no less conspicuous than the honor paid by these prominent men was the unfelgned grief of the "blanket" Indian, the Mexican laborer, and the poorest people generally, who followed the procession. In fact, Jew and gentile, Catholic and Protestant, native and foreigner, seemed alike to feel the common loss and to realize that a great citizen and public servant and a friend to all had gone to his reward.

We all love the man who loves and helps his brother. Whatever we may think of the theology we subscribe to the senti-ment of Leigh Hunt's classic poem, which within itself forms a fitting and convincing tribute to men who live as did NESTOR MONTOYA:

Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw within the moonlight of his room,
Making it rich and like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold.
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said,
"What writest thou?" The vision raised its head
And, with a look made of all sweet accord, Answered, "The names of those who love the Lord."
"And is mine one?" said Abou. "Nay, not so,"
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerlly still, and said, "I pray thee, then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow men."
The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
It came again, with a great awakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had blessed—
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest!

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, the suddenness of the call of the Angel of Death upon our lamented colleague, Hon. NESTOR MONTOYA, certainly should impress us with the uncertainty of life. He entered this Congress strong and vigorous and with prospects of many years of further usefulness to his State and country; and none of us supposed that we would so soon be called upon to mourn his death, which came unexpectedly. Without a note of warning he was stricken down, his large, generous heart ceased to beat, and his spirit was ushered into the presence of that almighty and all-wise Being who hath the issues of life and death in his own hands. Almost in the twinkling of an eye the strong man was brought low. Truly, "In the midst of life we are in death."

While I had never met Mr. Montoya until the assembling of this Congress, I was at once attracted to him by his genial and friendly personality, and I was glad when we were assigned to the same committee, during the sessions of which we were more closely associated. Our acquaintance rapidly grew into a firm and cordial friendship, which I greatly prized. I was soon impressed by his industry, his devotion to his constituency, and his intense loyalty to his party and his country. He was always regular in his attendance upon committee meetings and the sessions of the House, and ambitious to do his full share of work. He took a deep interest in the commercial growth of the country and the development of the Nation's natural resources, and in the advancement of all the interests that combine to make our people and our country great and prosperous. His desire was plainly manifest to do anything and everything in his power as a statesman to secure the greatest possible good to every portion of our common country.

His great ability, industry, and high ideals were recognized by the people of his own State by his selection to fill many posi-tions of honor and trust before he was sent here as their Rep-resentative in Congress; and his activity in the affairs of his State demonstrated his popularity and splendid qualification for leadership. He possessed everything to make life desirable; an honored name, the plaudits of the people, a loving wife and children to cluster about him, and to encircle themselves around his heart. He lived a noble life, and left a heritage to his children, as a cherished memory to his wife; a spotless reputation, and an honored name. His success and prominence in his State should convince the ambitious and aspiring youth of this country that-

The heights of great men reached and kept Were not attained by sudden flight, But they, while their companions slept Were toiling upward in the night.

I was appointed by the Speaker as a member of the com-mittee to attend the funeral at the home of our late colleague, but exacting and pressing official duties prevented my absence for so long a time. I have been privileged to read newspaper accounts of the funeral in which reference was made to the great outpouring of his life-long friends and neighbors, and the expressions of regret and sorrow occasioned by the death of this great and good man, which demonstrated conclusively that the high esteem in which he was held by his colleagues in both branches of Congress was well deserved. "Truly he has not lived in vain."

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, we all deplore very deeply the passing of that splendid genial spirit, Hon. Nestor Montoya. While I have been a Member of this body for 16 years, his is the first congressional funeral I have found the opportunity to attend. I felt it a privilege to contribute in any small way to the memory of this great man by attendance on the last sad rites of his notable career. No person could gain any conception of the fond affection in which Mr. Montoya was held by his neighbors and friends except by witnessing that vast concourse which followed his remains to their final resting place.

He had lived in the public eye during most of the years of his life. He served in each branch of the Territorial legislature for many years. He was honored with the speakership of his Territorial house, as a member of the constitutional convention, and as a member of the council of defense and chairman of the draft board throughout the World War. At the time of his passing he was editor of La Bandera Americana, president of the New Mexico State Press Association, a regent of the State University, and a Member of Congress at large from the State of New Mexico.

It was a privilege for me to serve on the same committee with Mr. Montoya when he first came to this House. Now that he has gone I look back with much pleasure on the fact that I was able to assist him in several small ways as a new Congressman. During all his long and faithful public service not one word of reproach was brought against his good name, and among all that immense throng which gathered at the funeral to pay just homage to his memory nothing but encomiums of praise could be heard of his righteous life. "Señor Montoya hombre derecho" was the unanimous verdict of his friends and neighbors.

He has gone to his just reward. We shall meet his genial personality no more in this world. But may his good wife, his splendid son, his dutiful and charming daughter, all his family, and all his friends and innumerable acquaintances take comfort and courage from the upright life which he lived and from the faith of meeting him in that great Undiscover'd country from whose bourne No traveler returns.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker and colleagues, the great State of New Mexico was settled several hundred years ago by the Spanish padres, or Spanish fathers, who located missions, and were followed by the Aztecs of old Mexico, who came up along the water courses, and lighted the torch of civilization and established the Christian religion out beyond where the sun sets. From the loins of that sturdy and hardy stock, my colleagues, sprang Nestor Montoya.

Mr. Speaker, it is only on rare occasions that I attend the funeral of a friend. I prefer to remember the way my friend looked when I last saw him in the full vigor of life and health. But, Mr. Speaker, I was personally and intimately acquainted with Nestor Montova. For a number of years I ranched in his State, Perhaps I am better acquainted with the Mexican-American, or equally so with him, than most of the men who come to this House. I have been in their homes. I have broken bread with them. I have practiced in the courts of New Mexico, both in the English and the Spanish language.

Nestor Montoya was born 60 years ago in old Albuquerque, now a town of adobe houses across the arroyo from the present beautiful city of that name, out there on the Santa Fe Railroad on the main line to the California coast. There as a boy and young man he met the clod and stubble of adversity such as all had to meet who grew up in that day and time out there almost past the shadow of civilization. He made friends; he exhibited an indomitable spirit from his earliest youth—a determination to surmount obstacles, to achieve success, but never at the cost of his conscience or his principles. And there never was a day in the life of Nestor Montoya that he did not have the confidence of his fellow men. From his early youth and up to the hour of his death he had the confidence, esteem, and good will of his friends and neighbors and, in fact, the entire citizenship of New Mexico.

For 15 years he was engaged in the newspaper business in the city of Albuquerque. He established a newspaper under the name of La Bandera Americana, which means The American Flag. Montona stood under and upheld that flag all the days of his life; and, my friends, knowing, as I do, the Mexican-American, the man who is born of Mexican parents in this country and who grows up with our institutions, permit me to state now that, from very close contact and personal observation during the World War, I have yet to recall one instance of disloyalty on the part of these people. They realize that under this great Government all men are created equal. They quickly get the ideas of our Government and our institutions, that guarantee the freedom of the individual, that protect the peasant in his hut with the same degree of protection as the millionaire in his castle. There are no more loyal Americans in this great Republic than these Mexican-Americans.

Of such stock was Nestor Montoya. With his good right hand and with his pen he helped to establish law and order in that country many years ago, when it was not so popular to stand for law and order as it is at the present time. But Nestor Montoya always upheld, with his splendid editorials in his paper, the maintenance of law and created a wholesome respect for the laws of his country. By his untiring efforts and his splendid example as a citizen he brought about that law and order that the people of New Mexico are proud to acclaim at the present time.

His district and mine adjoin. My district lies against his State, surrounding it about one-third of its boundary. The interests of his people and mine are closely interwoven. Both of us were greatly concerned with matters of irrigation, production of live stock, and mining. Naturally we were thrown together in close association. I had a little more legislative experience than my friend, having come here two years prior to his becoming a Member. I gladly assisted him in every way, and he always willingly came to my assistance. It is my recollection that he was successful in obtaining every office of trust and honor at the hands of his people to which he ever

He was speaker of the New Mexico Assembly in 1903 and also in 1910. I have had occasion very frequently in legal practice to visit the city of Santa Fe, the capital of the State. And I want to say, my friends, that while Nestor Montova was speaker of the New Mexico Legislature he presided over that body with fairness and with dignity, and that the speaker's chair was not the harsh bench of the magistrate but rather the woolsack of the chancellor. The minority respected him and admired him because he was fair and just in his rulings and, as my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. Carter] has just said about the frequent exclamations that were heard around his bler, "Este hombre Montova muy derecho." (Nestor Montova was a just man and right.)

My friends, if you want to get a true insight into the character of a man in his home, in his community, and in his State, go to the plain people—the working class, the laborers, the tender of the flocks, and the cowboy on the range, to the "mozo" and the "pelado," the peasant, the servant. Every one to whom I have ever mentioned the name of my good friend immediately said, "Señor Montoya, muy buen hombre." (Good man.) The plain people understood and loved him because he sympathized with them in their poverty and their distress, and while he acquired some of this world's goods by hard labor and close attention to his business, not one of these humble people described by my friend from Oklahoma—people clad in Navajo blankets and cowhide sandals—who sought his help and charitable assistance were ever turned away empty-handed. I regret his death, and the people of my home city, who knew him and knew his splendid qualities of heart and mind, likewise deeply regret his passing away.

Mr. Speaker, while Nester Montova was a consistent Republican in politics all the days of his life, first and above all he was a true American. He gave two sons and a son-in-law to fight for the liberty of the world and for universal democracy. He gave his money and his time without stint. He was chairman of the defense board of his State and also was an earnest worker in the Red Cross service and all other patriotic activities during the war.

In the death of our colleague, my friends, his State has sustained a serious loss. He always contributed to the material welfare of his people. He stood out for the right and had the confidence and esteem of both political parties in his home State. He wrought well there; he wrought well here. Peace to the soul of Nester Montaya.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, it was my good fortune to enjoy the personal friendship of Representative Nestor Montona. We occupied adjoining offices and I was thrown in frequent contact with him from the time he began his service in this body. From the very first acquaintance with him I was impressed with the simplicity and sincerity of the man. He was courteous, accommodating, and congenial. He was a typical westerner, with all the rugged characteristics of courage, common sense, loyalty, and chivalry. He was a hard-working man, seriously devoted to his duties. He was as regular as the clock in going and coming to his office and in attending the committees on which he served, and made it a rule when necessary to be present during the sessions of the House. He was diligent in business and faithful in the performance of every task. There was nothing of the spectacular about him. He was modest and unpretentious, and of a manner indicating much strength and unusual poise. He met the responsibilities of life with the spirit and purpose of one engaged in earnest and sincere efforts to serve his fellows.

There are rare instances in which men are elected to high office as a result of an abnormal and unusual state of public opinion or turn of the wheels of political fortune. Congressman Montona's honors never came that way. His rise in politics was not due to any of the tricks of the politician or inexplicable drift of the tide of public opinion. For many years he had served in various positions of trust and honor in his native State. He was called to serve in the House of Representatives of New Mexico, in which capacity he rose in the esteem and confidence of his fellows until he became speaker of that body. He served in that position with such fidelity and fairness, as has just been pointed out in the address of the gentleman from Utah [Mr. Colton], that he won an enviable reputation throughout the State. He was later elected a member of the State senate and made a record highly creditable to himself and his constituency. He served as clerk of the courts, and exhibited in that work the same care and efficiency which characterized all his undertakings.

In 1910 he was selected as a member of the convention that drafted the first constitution of the State of New Mexico. In that body he rendered lasting service to his people. He was a champion of the cause of education and served as regent of the University of New Mexico. He was for 15 years president of the New Mexico State Press Association and was owner and editor of a paper published in the Spanish language at Albuquerque, N. Mex., called La Bandera Americana, which means "The American Flag." The policies of the paper reflected the highest quality of patriotism and public spirit. At the outset of the entry of the United States into the war with Germany he was a member of the council of defense and chairman of the draft board of his county. So we see that his election to Congress in 1920 came as the tribute of a thoughtful people to one well known to all the voters of his State and who had been tested by oft repeated calls to public service. Such an honor might well be coveted by any citizen of this great Republic. Upon entering this body he at once displayed the same characteristics and capabilities that marked his career from its beginning.

Those of us who understand the struggles of congressional life do not expect a man to reach a position in this House that commands the attention of the country until he has had opportunity to make his way. But it does not take long for Members of the House to measure the worth of a new Member and forecast his possible growth and usefulness. The older Members remember full well men who upon entering this body set about the discharge of the routine duties of office and who faithfully and unostentatiously entered into the labors of the committees to which they were assigned and who performed their daily duties without show or pretense. But in a few years such a Member would become chairman of an important committee or fall into some larger responsibility and almost in a day the country would discover a national figure on the rolls of the House. Such instances may cause surprise to outsiders, but not so with Members of the House. Representative Mon-TOYA possessed the qualities which mark him as one capable of reaching a commanding position in the Congress. Throughout his public career his progress was steady and sure. No one can doubt that he would have continued to grow in power and usefulness had Providence spared him to continue his labors.

Representative Montova did not make politics the goal of life. Politics was only an incident. Official place appealed to him only as a means by which to render public service. He was so forgetful of his own political fortunes and so disregardful of selfish political aspirations that he chose the newspaper profession as his chief life work, thus daring the proverbial danger of writing a book. He was a man of too much courage and too high order of patriotism to hesitate to make known his position at any time when any question arose affecting his country's welfare. He rose to the best type of American citizenship and embodied the highest qualities of a public official. His record and his service will long be held in grateful memory by the people whom he served with loftiest patriotism and devotion.

Splendid as was his public service and high as were the honors bestowed upon him, it was in the circle of the home and family that the best and noblest of his attributes found expression and there it was that life for him loomed to its richest and best. He was a good father, a faithful and affectionate husband, and happy in the fullest trust and devotion of his family.

Death came to him all too soon. The mystery of it we do not understand. At the age of 60, with the appearance of one much younger, in the midst of his greatest activities and usefulness, with great designs unaccomplished, thinking only of continued service to his family and to his country, without even a moment's warning, he was stricken down and taken from us! We stand appalled and helpless in the presence of such a decree of divine Providence. With our poor human eyes we can not penetrate the mystery of it. But some time, somewhere, beyond the shadows of the dark valley where falls the light of eternal truth, it will all be made clear, where we hope to meet and know again all the loved and lost who await our coming there—

We'll catch the broken threads again And finish what we here began, Heaven will the mystery explain, And then, at then, we'll understand.

Mr. COLE of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, we are here for the purpose of paying tributes of respect to the memory of a few of our Members who have recently fallen in the battle of life. Mr. Montova has been taken away from us in the fullness and vigor of stalwart manhood. Such a dispensation is not humanly understandable. All life and all death are wrapped in veils of mystery. We are ushered on to this stage, we know not from whence; we are taken away, we know not whither. We can but stand in the golden dawn of the rising sun of a human soul, earnestly note its radiant ascendancy into the widening canopy of life, with the high hope that until the fullness of time its brilliancy shall not be dimmed, its glory not attenuated; and in that dread hour when the effulgent beams of that sun shall have been dispelled by the gloomy mists of death we can but stand upon the broad basis of the full faith that in yon far realm where immortal spirits dwell, God in his infinite wisdom had need of it.

I did not know Mr. Montova intimately. I served with him on one of the committees here and have known him only since he came to serve as a Member of this Congress. He was, so far as I know, an unassuming, unpretentious gentleman, but equipped with all those things that are necessary to make one a valuable and a valued citizen among his people. He was a son of the wide plains of the West, born, I understand, in the midst of penury and privation, but with a resolute determination, with an invincible fortitude, with an unswerving loyalty, with a deep-seated conviction of right and a great reverence for Almighty God, he struggled through those early adversities and developed into that character of man of which our Nation is in sore need, and took his place among the leading men of his part of this great Nation. But he has been suddenly called away from us, as I say, in the fullness of life. His work seemed to be incomplete and unfinished here, and therein lies one of the strong reasons why I believe in the immortality of the soul. I know the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth His handiwork, that day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge, bespeaking in unmistakable language the existence of a Supreme Being, but as to the immortality of the human soul, when the somber shadows of death are falling and the cold dews of eternal night are moistening the aged and furroughed brow, we stand in awe and witness in silent solemnity the inscrutable work of the Great Conqueror. Or when one who has fought the battles of early existence, and standing upon the threshold of the higher possibilities of life, looking with eager, anxious eye upon the broad expanse of a brightly illuminated future, is suddenly enveloped in the mantle of death and taken away, with bowed heads and aching hearts and tearful eyes we stand in the overwhelming atmosphere of the sad spectacle. Or when a little child, like a tiny dewdrop sparkling in life's morning sun, falls to the earth and is no more, compassion robs us of language and we sit in silent submission to the Divine command. Yet, in that sad, solemn hour none of them seemed complete. When the angel of death gently kissed their seemed complete. When the angel of death gently kissed their pallid brows and bore their kindly spirits to the All-Wise God who gave them, right well might we have written at the end of their life's history the last words "unfinished, unfinished." And may we not hope and believe that somewhere, it may be beyond the moon, beyond the sun, beyond the stars, but somewhere in Illimitable space they shall be permitted to continue the work that was unfinished here, for-

When the vast sun shall veil his golden light, Deep in the gloom of everlasting night; When wild destructive flames shall wrap the skies, When ruin triumphs and when nature dies, Man shall, alone, the wreck of worlds survive, 'Mid falling spheres immortal man shall live.

Miss ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, so much has been said covering all the life of our colleague, Mr. Montoya, that I come with only one little tribute to the humanity of the man, and the bravery of him. We came into the House together, I did not know how finished a politician he was. He did not assert himself but, like myself, sat over to one side waiting, perhaps, to earn a more conspicuous place in the House. We used to exchange opinions briefly about matters as they came up. Almost invariably he said: "I shall vote with the committee," but he always had the bill, always looked it over, always knew why he should vote with the committee. I sat very near him in the Committee on Indian Affairs, where he faithful in attendance. Always he went through the work carefully, marking changes in bills and voting intelligently. remember him with greatest admiration as the best and bravest loser I ever saw. After having had such an enormous vote in his election to this Congress he was defeated-no; not defeated, but New Mexico gave the Republican nomination to a woman. When he came back and told me about it, he did so in the most beautiful, most chivalrous, and most courteous way, speaking in highest terms of the lady and his hopes for her election. He was loyal to his party, his State, his Nation. His loyalty to the Senators of his State made me feel that the predominating characteristic of the man was loyalty to his ideals. He was a good soldier. He helped me by his brave party loyalty that bore defeat like victory. You have with finished oratory given his wonderful life history. It has only remained for me to say that I shall be always stronger for my brief acquaintance with him.

Mr. COLTON assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission that all Members who have spoken may be permitted to revise and ex-tend their remarks, and also that Members who wish to extend their remarks be permitted to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I also ask permission to have incorporated in this day's proceedings an address written by Hon, B. C. Hernandez, a former colleague and a Member of the Sixty-sixth Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, much mention has been made here to-day of the great funeral held in the city of Albuquerque. I was one of the Members appointed by the Speaker of the House to attend that funeral, and I also delivered an oration at the grave, complying with the Spanish custom of the Southwest, and in order to preserve in the RECORD a history of that great funeral, I desire to be permitted to incorporate in the RECORD the local press accounts of the papers of Albuquerque and also ask permission that my own oration at the The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the request of the gentleman will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, the 13th of January, 1923, at the Nation's Capital, while apparently in the fullness of health, Hon. Nestor Montoya, New Mexico's Representative in the Sixty-seventh Congress, was stricken from the roll of the living. God's finger touched him, and he slept.

Born April 4, 1853, he was the descendant of a long line of pure Spanish ancestry, tracing beyond the days of the con-quistadores, whose descendants prior to 1846 ruled New Mexico and adjacent territory under the flag of Spain. He was the sole Member in the House of Representatives from the fortysole Member in the House of Representatives from the Polyseventh State of the Union, whose capital city was important more than three centuries ago, before New York, Philadelphia, or Washington were thought of and before the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth Rock. The Spanish were brave men then, and are loyal and patriotic Americans now. Don Nestor Montoya rang type to that brilliant adventurous remantic yet study stock. true to that brilliant, adventurous, romantic, yet sturdy, stock from which he sprang and which pioneered that part of America now known within the borders of the Union as the great Southwest. He was known among his fellows and associates for distinguished abilities and achievements, and his life was an example of manly worth and moral integrity that reflects honor upon his people and entitles him to their affectionate remembrances. He was a true example of their religious, social, and industrial life and a representative of the convictions and principles they adopt as their guides in their participation in the affairs of State and National Government.

On the 14th of January his death was officially proclaimed. in Congress by the unanimous adoption by the House of the customary and appropriate resolution and arrangements for the funeral. The official party, consisting of a son and daughter, a Senator, and five Members of the House of Representatives, left Washington, accompanying the remains, Monday evening, January 15, 1923, and after continuous travel ar-rived at Albuquerque the following Thursday evening, January 18. In the glorious afterglow of a rarified western sunset, when the heavens seemed to be filled with slain sunlight, his mortal remains approached home. Home—a place dear in life, precious in death—more genuine pleasures therein to be found than in all the splendors and glories of the earth. There, at home, were the wife, children, and grandchildren, dear rela-They never go back on us to the end. They never turn their backs on us. And the people, his constituents, who also loved him well, were there.

The following Saturday, beginning at 8 a. m., starting from the Montoya residence in the old town of Albuquerque, thousands formed a procession to the little Church of San Felipe de where our late colleague worshiped many years. building was erected prior to the year 1706-more than 217 years ago-when what is now known as old Albuquerque was one of the most important towns in New Mexico. Its historical antiquity has passed. It is now but a suburb of the new and modern American city of Albuquerque—a mile distant-which has usurped the old town's name and importance. Thousands crowded within, without, and about the church

Immediately following the services the cortege proceeded through the main thoroughfare of old and new Albuquerque to the place of interment, and the multitudes lining the streets stood with bared heads while the procession passed. Every flag on every building was at half mast.

We laid him away on a hillside sloping up to the mesa, which extended to the not far distant snow-capped mountains—and the cemetery was called "Little Santa Barbara." Following the beautiful Spanish custom, funeral orations were delivered at the open grave. Multitudes filled the cemetery and silently listened, and by their presence paid their loving tribute.

The next day the Albuquerque (N. Mex.) Morning Journal said:

The funeral of the late Congressman NESTOR MONTOYA was probably the most impressive ever held in Albuquerque—perhaps the most impressive ever held in the State of New Mexico.

He was held in high esteem by his colleagues in the Congress as well as by the people of New Mexico. He died at the height of his fame. He is to be envied in that he did not live too long, for-

When 'tis given us to choose the time, If we choose aright, 'Tis best to die our honor at its height.

He is gone from us—gone before us. Strength and beauty, kindness and wrath, wisdom and folly, laughter and frown—all the elements of life and his living of it have ceased their visible play and action.

Said despairing Villon-

Where are the snows of yesteryear?

Vanished, he would have us believe. Yes; but vanished only in form. "The snows of yesteryear" are in the stream, in cloud and rain, in sap of tree and bloom of flower, in heart and brain of talent and of beauty. Nothing is lost even here on our ancient kindly earth. So the energies of our friend, and those of all men, have touched into activity forces that, influencing still others, will move on forever.

The address of Mr. Hernandez and the clippings are as

ADDRESS OF HON. B. C. HERNANDEZ, FORMER MEMBER OF CONGRESS FROM NEW MEXICO.

"When divine Providence removed from this world the Hon. NESTOR MONTOYA He took a good, kindly, and lovable man, a type of man who had the faculty of making friends wherever he went, a type of man that in life's rough pathway always finds time to sow a flower here and there in order to make the journey more agreeable and pleasant. Moreover, when so removed from among us, this splendid public servant, one of New Mexico's gifted sons was taken from our midst, we ourselves find that an uncommon man has been suddenly summoned before his Creator by that grim reaper, death.

NESTOR MONTOYA'S personal history is naturally interwoven with New Mexico's history for the last 45 years. We find him in the early eighties, as soon as he had graduated from St. Michael's College, taking his place among the public men of his time; first as translator and interpreter in the district courts. He developed the qualifications of interpreter until he was considered one of the most efficient of his day.

"In the early nineties we find him at the head of a Spanish publication in San Miguel County, with headquarters in the city of Las Vegas. About that same time his public career really commenced by being elected from that county to the legislature during Territorial régime. Four or five years later we find him engaged in what he had chosen as his profession, newspaper man and interpreter, in Bernalillo County, where he had established the paper that was part of his life for the last 20 years. La Bandera Americana, which he edited and managed successfully. He was chosen president of the New Mexico Press Association, where he served up until the time of his death with efficiency and distinction, always alert, energetic, and a clean-cut gentleman.

"Later on we find him in the Territorial council of the legislative assembly, a position equivalent to that of State senator in these days, wherein by his experience as a legislator and newspaper man he had become a very useful public servant. When New Mexico was admitted a State in 1910 and a constitutional convention had to be chosen he was elected as one of the delegates from Bernalillo County, and in that important body he played a very useful part, always alert for the rights of the Spanish-American people, because he realized that they needed his defense and his services, and that fundamental law of New Mexico bears the imprint of his intense patriotism and love for his fellow man in many of its provisos.

"Later on we find him during the World War with all the intensity of his soul defending the rights of his country; going among the people and with his wonderful oratorical powers persuading them to buy bonds and to place themselves at the disposition of their Government. His three sons, following the advice of their good father, served honorably in the World War.

"Montoya was a patriot first; an efficient and faithful public servant always. During his career, like a good many men who take part in the public affairs of the State, he had his ups and downs; but to his credit be it said that whenever he was defeated, or his friends thought that he ought to take a back seat, he accepted their verdict with the grace of a natural-born diplomat.

"He had his difficulties in life's rough pathway, but his do-mestic life was a complete success, always kind and considerate to his family. He lived a happy life in his home, and to-day his wife and family mourn the death of a kind and considerate husband and a good father. Neighbors miss the advice of a wise and kindly counselor; his friends a faithful and loyal

"New Mexico has lost one of its gifted sons. His death, like his life, was impressive, and around his bier the people gathered and, with sincere grief in their hearts and tears in their eyes, accompanied by the distinguished company appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, a delegation of his former colleagues, laid him at rest beside his beloved mother, who had preceded him to the grave a few years before, and paid their last impressive tribute to this good man.

For the first time in the history of the Territory and State of New Mexico one of our Congressman has died while in office and buried with all the honors worthy of a great and useful public servant. Although we have been part of this United States for the past 75 years, and not less than perhaps 40 of New Mexico's distinguished citizens have served as legislators and Senators and Congressmen, for the first time the Congress of the United States through its delegation has been called upon to pay the last tribute of love to one of our Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

"The family of the deceased as well as the people of New Mexico wish to express their appreciation for the honor thus paid to our distinguished son, and from the bottom of their hearts wish to thank the honorable Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives for the kindly, although sad, tribute paid to this distinguished son of New Mexico."

"Speaking as representative of the congressional body, Congressman C. J. Thompson, of Ohio, rendered a glowing funeral oration at the grave of Nestor Montoya as the former Congressman was lowered to his final rest, just after noon yesterday, in the little Santa Barbara Cemetery.

"The funeral of the late Congressman was probably the most Impressive ever held in Albuquerque, perhaps the most impressive ever held in the State of New Mexico. Starting at 8 o'clock yesterday morning from the Montoya home, the services lasted four and a half hours.

"From the family home the cortege proceeded to the little Catholic church in Old Albuquerque, the San Felipe de Nert Church, where Nestor Montoya worshiped for many years. The little church was crowded with friends of the late Congressman, while hundreds stood outside unable to gain entrance to the church, but paying homage as best they could to the esteemed dead.

PLAGS AT HALF-MAST.

"Following the services the cortege proceeded through the streets of Old and New Albuquerque and on to the little ceme-tery on the hillside of Martineztown. There was a host of notables in the procession; along the route of the funeral thousands stood with barred heads as the procession passed, while every flag on every building in the city was at half-mast. All traffic across Central Avenue was halted during the passage of the procession.

"The funeral procession covered more than six city blocks. In front 75 members of the S. N. M. A. M. P. marched in double Then came the old-town society, Alianza Society. The car with the priests officiating and the altar boys, the congressional car, committee from the New Mexico Senate, committee from the New Mexico House of Representatives, honorary pallbearers, active pallbearers, hearse, family cars, and friends. There were 57 automobiles behind the family cars.

"In addition to the oration rendered by Congressman Thompson orations were offered by former Governor Larrazolo and M. C. Ortiz. The latter, a lifelong friend of Nestor Montoya, delivered an oration in both Spanish and English. Former Governor Larrazolo, a magnificent orator, delivered one of the most powerful addresses of his career. He pursued the theme that Nestor Montova has merely moved on to greater glory in another world, there to await the arrival of his friends. address was delivered in Spanish."

LAST TRIBUTE TO MONTOYA IS IMPRESSIVE EVENT—HUNDREDS TAKE PART—FIRST TIME IN STATE'S HISTORY THAT NEW MEXICO REPRESENTATIVE HAS DIED WHILE IN ACTIVE SERVICE—CONGRESSMAN THOMPSON PAYS ELOQUENT TRIBUTE TO COLLEAGUE.

"The last respects paid to NESTOR MONTOYA, New Mexico's deceased Congressman, which began with funeral services early Saturday morning and were not completed until 1 o'clock Saturday afternoon marked an unusual event in New Mexico history.

It is the first time in its history that New Mexico has lost Congressman by death when he was actually serving in the Nation's governing body. It is the first time in the State's history that Members of Congress have traveled so many miles to join hands with Albuquerque and State legislative committees to pay a final tribute to one in the first rank of citizenshipa New Mexico statesman.

"Persons in all walks of life stood with uncovered heads besides the Nation's Representatives as early as 8.30 o'clock Saturday morning at the Montoya home. As was told in Saturday night's Albuquerque Herald 2,000 attended the service at the night's Albuquerque Heraid 2,000 attended the service at the San Felipe de Neri Church after the procession had gone from the home. Hundreds, in one of the longest funeral processions on record here, went to Santa Barbara Cemetery, where ora-tions were given by former Gov. O. A. Larrazolo, Modesto C. Ortiz, and Congressman C. J. Thompson of Ohio.

ORATION DELIVERED BY HON. C. J. THOMPSON AT THE GRAVE OF HON. NESTOR MONTOYA, ALBUQUERQUE, N. MEX., JANUARY 20, 1923.

"As Members of the Congress of the United States, we are here to-day beside an open grave uniting with those of New Mexico who mourn the loss of a distinguished citizen.

"NESTOR MONTOYA was born in old Albuquerque and lived his life among you. You know him well. He was a useful citizen and a devoted husband and father-devoted to his country, devoted to his family.

"In whatever capacity called upon to serve-whether as an official interpreter of district courts in Territorial days, or member or speaker of the Territorial legislature, or State senator, he was never found wanting. As founder of the daily-La Bandera Americana-he performed a useful service to his city and State, and it was so recognized when he was elected president of the New Mexico Press Association. He was regent of the University of New Mexico, and only yesterday its president, Doctor Hill, testified to Nestor Montoya's zeal and helpfulness to the institution. As clerk of courts he carried into his work there his well-known accuracy and ability. In 1911 he became a member of the State constitutional convention, and during the World War he was a member of the local council of national defense and chairman of the local draft board. It was because of his activity and usefulness as a citizen that he was called to the higher duties in the legislative branch of the Federal Government. On the 4th of March, 1921, he entered the Congress of the United States. From the very first he was singled out as a fitting and true representative of his people—diligent, painstaking, courteous, attentive to his duties. He was made a member of the Committees on Public Lands and Indian Affairs. In the exacting and responsible work of those committees he attracted the favorable attention of his colleagues. He became respected for his accurate information, sound judgment, and the wisdom that he brought forth in counsel.

"NESTOR MONTOYA was loved and respected by his colleagues In Congress. He was true to his party and loyal to his Gov-ernment. He kept the faith. He was neither trimmer nor fawner, but frowned upon everything he deemed unwise or ill advised or against the best interest of the public. He was an honest man.

"A little more than a week ago he was in the fullness of health, looking forward longingly to the 4th of March, when he might return to dear old Albuquerque to enjoy life with his family, children, and grandchildren, not realizing that the angel of death was hovering near. On the morning of the 13th of January, without a moment's warning, the brittle thread of life was broken and his noble soul was ushered into the great unknown. Destiny ordained that from the Nation's Capital, from the midst of his colleagues who loved him well, he should cease his labors and start on the long, long trail. The ineffable Spirit of Wisdom and Love decreed it. He lived a useful and honorable life, and therefore a successful life, and had attained high honor of state reached by comparatively few men.

We, his colleagues, in the busy days and closing hours of the Sixty-seventh Congress, left our work, traveled westward over thousands of miles of plains and mountains to exemplify the love and esteem in which NESTOR MONTOYA was held at Washington, and to aid you, his family, neighbors, and friends in the last sad rites due the distinguished dead.

"Not crowns of gold nor diamonded gifts, nor song, nor speech, nor loud acclaim can fittingly express the honor that is his due. All that strong arms and beautiful hands can do is to aid in the silent ministries of the hour. Under the laurels and the lilies, under the roses and green boughs and fragrant blossoms we leave the mortal parts of him whose immortal spirit has passed on to the reward which awaits him.

'Friend, comrade, colleague, good-bye!"

THE LATE HON. JOHN I. NOLAN.

Mr. CURRY took the chair as Speaker pro tempore. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the special order of the day.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. Curry, by unanimous consent— Ordered, That Sunday, February 25, 1923, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. John I. Nolan, late a Representative from the State of California.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 561.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. JOHN I. NOLAN, late a Member of this House from the State of California.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of the exercises of the day, shall stand editorread.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The question was taken, and the resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, John Nolan presented to this Congress and to America an outstanding example of what a great thing a real man may make of a life. Out of the matter-of-fact materials which are ready to the hand of every man Congressman NoLAN builded a noble structure upon the enduring foundations of service.

In the days when the Spanish Empire was the mightiest power in the world the pillars of Hercules were regarded as the uttermost points of solid land. The Emperor of Spain had on his coins a representation of these twin crags of two continents and, underneath, the words "No more beyond."

Then there came a day when Christopher Columbus, flying the colors of Spain, sailed out on the blue Mediterranean, past the pillars of Hercules, and westward into the uncharted sea. He discovered a new world and his achievements made the old motto an absurd and ridiculous tribute to ignorance. The discovery of America compelled the Spanish ruler to strike from his coins the first word of his motto and make it "More beyond."

If we were to symbolize the life and career of the man in whose memory we have gathered to-day, we should have to strike another word from that old Spanish motto and make it "Beyond."

All his life this son of the Golden West kept his eyes fixed upon the sunrise and planned for the future. His spirit was in tune with the urge eternal for brotherhood and social justice. He looked beyond the rugged rocks and stinging briers in the pathway of to-day to the solid roadway built by cooperation for the bannered march of crowned humanity to-morrow.

All men are engaged in the quest for happiness, and, alas, there are many who find it not. John Nolan was engaged in the quest of justice for humankind, and in that search he found

There can be no holier grail than the justice which comes from the practice of the Golden Rule and the rendering to every man his due. In illuminated letters around the great capitol at Harrisburg may be read its meaning as defined by James Madison.

Justice is the end of government. It is the aim of civil

It always has been pursued and always will be pursued, until it be attained or until liberty be lost in the pursuit.

That priceless boon will be attained and liberty will not be lost in the pursuit because of choice spirits and loyal hearts like John Nolan who are willing to do and dare and die for

JOHN NOLAN held no diploma from university or college but he was educated in the highest sense. For what is education save training to think clearly and act wisely? It is not a collection of shreds and patches of useless arts, but the wisdom of the heart which is better than the merchandise of silver and the gain thereof than fine gold. Education is found in love for truth and the ability to see and appreciate the beau-tiful and the true in humblest mankind. It is an enthusiasm for liberty and a spirit of sympathy for the unfortunate and oppressed. It is the cultivation of the mind through friendship with noble purposes and fellowship with noble ideals. It is love for labor and desire for knowledge. If a man have not these he is not educated, though he number his degrees by the score. John Nolan had such an education, garnered and gleaned from every field of life he traveled from the cradle

Scan his record of 10 years' faithful service in the American Congress and you will read in every line his devoted service to his fellow men. He shared the burdens of his brothers and was earnest with heart and hand to make others free

JOHN NOLAN put the man above the dollar. He counted factory workers of more importance than factories. He believed that machinists are greater than machines. He counted the molder more valuable than the molds. Above the building he put the builders, and above the things of money he put the things of manhood, wrought of human blood and brain and brawn.

He worked out measures to increase home owning, believing that the average man should have a stake in the soil of America.

He introduced bills for a comprehensive employment service, so that the jobless man and the manless job might be brought together and the fear of enforced idleness be removed from the workers of the country.

He was never supine and satisfied when he saw unfairness, injustice, and cruelty in our industrial system. Splendidly he struggled for remedy and in sure faith that America will finally achieve the true progress which means lessened contrast between the house of have and the house of want. Such men are sometimes called agitators, but they perform the supremely important task of marshaling a nation's conscience to mold its

So long as there is one man degraded by involuntary and undeserved poverty; so long as there is one child dwarfed by enforced toll, men like JOHN NOLAN are needed in public life. And only when there are left no such defenders of social justice to whom we may pay the tributes we pay to-day to our hon-ored friend will the downfall of America be assured.

JOHN NOLAN was a believer in democracy, in rule by all the people. That was the guiding star in his political career, and he followed it in triumph and defeat. He was a follower of Theodore Roosevelt, the greatest American of our times, and he was a progressive in all the word implies.

Mr. Speaker, the influence and inspiration of the life of John Nolan are not dead because his mortal remains have been laid to rest in mother earth. They will live on, duplicating and reduplicating themselves in the lives of others, who, like him, will catch the glory of the ideal of justice between man and man and will follow the gleam. Other tollers and thinkers and statesmen and seers will strive for the same goal, and they will find the path smoother and easier because of his unyielding courage and undaunted faith.

I knew John Nolan intimately for 10 years and valued his friendship most highly. Witnessing his consistent efforts for human betterment through those years, I have felt many times that in his life and career he was the very embodiment of Kipling's idea of what a man should be. You remember that great poem descriptive of real manhood-

If you can keep your head when all about you Are losing theirs and blaming it on you; If you can trust yourself when all men doubt you, But make allowance for their doubting, too; If you can wait and not grow tired of waiting, Or, lied about, don't deal in lies, Or, being hated, don't give way to hating, And yet don't look too good nor talk too wise.

If you can dream and not make dreams your master, If you can think and not make thoughts your alm. If you can meet both triumph and disaster, And treat those two imposters just the same. If you can bear to see the truth you've spoken, Twisted by knaves to make a trap for fools, Or see the work you gave your life to broken, And stoop and build it up again with worn-out tools.

If you can talk with crowds, but keep your virtue. Or walk with kings nor lose the common touch. If neither fees nor loving friends can hurt you. If all men count with you, but none too much. If you can fill each unforgiving minute. With 60 seconds' worth of distance run, The earth is yours and everything that's in it; And what is more, you'll be a man, my son.

Such a man was John Nolan, who conquered circumstances through the ability which is a poor man's goal and the ambition to serve his fellow men. His motto was "beyond," and through to serve his fellow men. His motto was beyond, the helphts where morning is breaking for mankind.

And in the great beyond, to which he has journeyed, may he be given royal welcome home by that master servant of hu-manity who said: "I am come to preach good tidings to the poor, to heal the broken hearted, to set at liberty them that are

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, one of the gifted writers of America has scattered along life's pathways a series of literary gems depicting the hopes and aspirations of our people, and among the lines she has written are these words:

Let me to-day do something that shall take A little sadness from the world's vast store, And may I be so favored as to make Of joy's too scanty sum a little more.

Let me not hurt, by any selfish deed Or thoughtless word, the heart of foe or friend; Nor would I pass, unseeing, worthy need, Or sin by silence when I should defend.

However meager be my worldly wealth, Let me give something that shall aid my kind, A word of courage, or a thought of health, Dropped as I pass for troubled hearts to find.

Let me to-night look back across the span "Twixt dawn and dark, and to my conscience say Because of some good act to beast or man, "The world is better that I lived to-day."

Surely it can be said of him whom we mourn here to-day, "The world is better that JOHN I. NOLAN lived in it."

After 14 years in public life I have come to the conclusion that the men who come up from poverty and obscurity through the long lane that leads to responsibility and power never forget the human element in the great questions which come before them, and weigh them in the light of the hopes and the welfare of those who struggle under the handicap of privation and adversity. Our departed friend had this trait to a marked degree.

He approached the problems which came before him as a Member of the American Congress with courage and a sincere sense of justice and fair play, and if there was any doubt in his mind he gave the benefit of the doubt to the class who were handicapped and who he felt were at a disadvantage in the struggle for existence. And that fact became known to his colleagues in the House-that he was usually found on the right side of great questions-and scores of us who knew and trusted him were glad and proud to follow his example and leadership.

He brought to each problem a clear mind and an honest heart, and the good he did will live long after he has passed away Surely he exemplified that life which was depicted by Alfred

Austin, once poet laureate of England:

But if in unheroic days

No great deed may be done,
Let me at least deserve this praise:

"He lived and died as one
Who looked on life with fearless eyes,
And with intrepid mind;
So leaves, where now he silent lies,
An honored name behind."

JOHN I. NOLAN was looked upon by organized labor as their special friend, champion, and pleader. From the day when as a sturdy young workman he entered the foundry down to the time of his death his voice was raised in behalf of those who earn bread in the sweat of their brow. He believed in the dignity and the power of labor; he was proud to fight their battles, and he brought to the task a keen, analytical mind and a determination which made him a worthy foeman. Labor in return held him in the highest esteem and honored him as their champion and friend.

His colleagues on the Committee on Labor, of which he was the chairman, esteemed him for his ability, honored him for his courage, and loved him for his kindness and courtesy, and join with his family and friends in paying tribute to his Men of great responsibility and power also recognized his ability, courage, and steadfastness of purpose, and his judgment was sought and respected by the leaders of the House among his great friends and admirers being the great parliamentarian and statesman from Illinois, Hon. James R. Mann, who so soon followed him on the long journey into the great beyond.

An example of this was shown at a great banquet held in New York City in December of last year, which was attended by more than 300 of the patent attorneys of the country, as well as many prominent financiers. Hon. Thomas Ewing, former Commissioner of Patents, paid a tribute to the departed Member, labor leader, and statesman, and resolutions were unanimously adopted expressing the sympathy of the gathering to his bereaved family.

Mr. Nolan was a member of the steering committee of his party, and his name was considered by President Warren Gi Harding for the post of Secretary of Labor.

His life was another example of the great opportunities which abound here in America, and the story of the life and work of this young, enthusiastic Irish worker reads like a romance, and his record of constructive achievement has indelibly impressed his name upon the hearts of his fellow men of every station of life.

And better by far to have walked through life as he did, to have made some life brighter, some home happier, to have earned the love and respect of one's fellow men than to reach the heights of earthly glory over the torn hearts and crushed bodies of one's fellow creatures here below.

"The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away," but he has not taken the good deeds done, the memory of the tender sympathy of full manhood which manifested itself to some one who needed it far beyond their power to express.

O for the clasp of a friendly hand, and the sound of a voice that "Rest in peace," saith those who knew and loved him. The lengthening shadows of eternal darkness overtook and encompassed him when the sun of life was near its meridian, but it has not blotted out, and never will, the sacred place he has enshrined upon the loving tablets of memory.

He played a man's part in the struggle in the se-called game of life and he carried the banner of the right as he saw it, and was twice armed in that security which right alone gives. In the words of a gifted bard:

What boots it, that thou stand'st alone, And laughest in the battle's face When all the weak have fled the place And let their feet and fears keep pace? Thou wavest still thine ensign high, And shoutest thy loud battle cry; Higher than e'er the tempest roared, It cleaves the silence like a sword.

Right arms and armors, too, that man Who will not compromise with wrong; Tho single, he must front the throng, And wage the battle hard and long. Minorities, since time began, Have shown the better side of man; And often in the lists of Time One man has made a cause sublime!

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have taken a great. interest in this day's ceremonies and in the tributes which have been paid to our departed Members. Except Mr. Montona, I was fairly well acquainted with all of them. The reaper has been busy in our ranks, and sometimes on occasions like this it may be a test of our faith if we try to repeat sincerely, "God is in His heaven, all's well with the world." Listening to the trib utes paid to-day, I am not so sure we have not found an answer to our doubts in the very tribute to these departed colleagues. It is good to hear the virtues of our friends truthfully recounted. Those who loved him present the character of our good friend. from New Hampshire, and even now, though dead, he liveth. He was a Christian without guile. He was a patriot without knowing sections. I conceive that could all our different sections of the country meet with such men as Burroughs, aye, meet with such men as Osborne, aye, meet with such men as John I. Nolan, and meet with such men as from his character portrayed here I understand was Montoya, the sectional hate and feeling that once existed, if not now buried, would be buried forever. I, too, was on a committee with Mr. BURROUGHS, and I subscribe to all that was said by those who preceded me. He was a gentleman, he was an able man, he was a faithful man, and so was Captain Osborne, of California. spent two delightful months with him in 1920 on a trip to the He was a delightful companion. He was a Union soldier, but in his love of country he knew no North, no South. He lived for a short time in the South and loved her people as his own. But, perhaps, I knew better than either of the other gentlemen whose memory we are now consecrating with our tributes John I. Nolan, of California. He, too, was a gentleman. Born in poverty though he was, it may be, poor at least, every instinct and feeling of a gentleman was his. Gentlemen are not made by wealth or station, or education even. Gentlemen are born with that innate quality of heart that gives kindness and human brotherhood, and with that quality John I. Nolan was well bestowed. It was because I knew him, and I. think knew him well, that I asked to-day to be permitted to pay this brief tribute to his memory. He was not so much a Demo-crat or a Republican as he was simply the workingman's friend, and yet he was no extremist. He was always poised and clear, and the rich as well as the poor could look to him for justice.

I think I had the pleasure of taking with him his bridal trip. In the morning of young manhood he had found a companion and helpmeet, and I think it was in 1913 or 1914 that he went on his trip down to the Panama Canal. His little lady was with him, cheerful, joyous, and bright, not dreaming that in a few short years, less than a dozen, the light of her life would go out and he who was then its cheerfulness would slumber in his last sleep. Mr. Speaker, I deem it rather a peculiar privilege that I have had to have been somewhat of an intimate friend with two men in this House whom I have regarded as the ablest representatives of labor that have been sent here. I was intimately acquainted with William B. Wilson, Secretary of Labor under the late administration, and no more loyal defender of the cause of the workingmen and the brotherhood of man existed. than William B. Wilson; and JOHN L. NOLAN was another just like him. I really hoped that when the new administration succeeding that of President Wilson took power they would clothe John I. Nolan with the garment that designated that member of the Cabinet who represents labor as Secretary of Labor. But these men are gone. NoLAN's work is ended. He who rules in heaven has written to his life "Finis." Captain Osborne was past three score and ten, Mr. Montona a little younger; Mr. Burroughs was in the prime of life; Mr. Nolan had scarcely reached the zenith of his powers. But the grim reaper knows no age.

Oh, it inspires us to hope-nay, more, it inspires us to believe-that there is a land beyond, where the souls that lingered not longer here will take up the march and go onward and onward to the perfect day. And this is the lesson to us from what has been said here. Let us live as these have lived, so that when our days are numbered and we sleep with our fathers, all who knew us can truthfully say the world is better that we lived.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, in my 10 years of congressional life I never had a finer friend than John I. Nolan, whose loss we mourn here to-day. It was my privilege to know him well almost from the first week I entered Congress, and as the years have passed I got to know him better. With all his friends and with his family I am saddened almost beyond expression when I realize we shall no more look upon his honest face.

JOHN NOLAN was not born with a silver spoon in his mouth. From early in life he had to make his own way in the world, and he became a genuine horny-handed son of toil. He was an iron molder by trade and he boasted of it. His fellow workmen saw in him qualities of leadership which made them love him, and it was at their unceasing requests that he entered public service, first as a member of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, and then he came to Congress in 1913. He served his fellow citizens of San Francisco in these legislative halls for 10 years with devotion, integrity, ability, and loyalty rarely surpassed.

Keen and vigorous always in the pursuit of his legislative calling, he was never so engrossed in the thoughts of his work that he would not halt to speak the cheering word, and, if occasion recommended, to do an act of helpfulness to his fellow legislator.

He was called a "labor Representative," and he was truly the friend of labor. Yet, men of affairs and business knew the richness of his gentle, manly soul and they respected, admired, and esteemed him,

His gospel always was that of good fellowship, with none of its detractions. John Nolan, without much book education, was a man of intellect, and he was always high-toned in character. Generous, kindly natured, he was always a devoted friend, a gallant gentleman. His friends in the city of his birth were legion, and it may be truly said of him that "none knew him but to love him, nor named him but to praise.

When I stop to think of the ceremonies here conducted in this Sabbath day in memory of John Nolan and our other colleagues who have passed to the great beyond, I am reminded of the words of the eloquent Ingalls, long a Senator from the State of Kansas, who said on an occasion similar to this, the lives of these men we mourn to-day are as a taper that is burned out, then we treasure their memories in vain, and their last prayer has no more sancity to us who soon or late must follow them, than the 'whisper of winds that stir the leaves of the protesting forest or the murmur of waves that break upon the complaining shere."

But, Mr. Speaker, this we know in our hearts can not be. The mind, perhaps, may quail before so stupendous a theme, and fret and chafe at its own limitations; but the soul receives its illumination more simply, by rays direct from the sources Two objects of contemplation," said Kant, "excite of things. ' my wonder-the starry heavens and the moral law' '-to which the world has added a third, "Life after death!

For this is the faith that has healed a myriad sorrows and persuaded a myriad mourners to the resumption of bitter tasks after the heartbreak of the newly opened grave. This is the truth, seen through tears, that has decked great cities with monuments and inspired mighty chants of hope, triumphant over grief. A Milton and a Shelley, a Tennyson and an Arnold, easing their soul's anguish in rhythmic lamentations, voice for humanity the universal loss and its sole consolation.

What life is led in the undiscovered country none may presume to declare. We visit it only in imagination, blindfolded, as it were, by these wrappings of mortal clay. But visit we must, now and then. Like Orpheus searching among the shades for his lost Eurydice, like Demeter descending to embrace once more her stolen daughter, we, too, are led by irresistible impulses to enter the world of the departed; and we know after such communions, brief though they be, that it is a higher and nobler world than this, for we have beheld our dear ones there, beatified and exalted; and we ourselves return radiant with a tenderness and a tranquillity not of earth.

The very last word of human sympathy is spoken by us-day. We come together out of the dazzling day into a dimmer light, with voices a little lowered and heads a little bent, our hearts caught and entwined in fluttering ribbons that stretch, we know not how, over space and time to the invisible world, and we know that the granite of the hills shall pass away sooner than the tenants of that realm.

Let us then here and now publicly commune with those immortals and acknowledge it our noblest privilege to do so. Let each of us here summon vividly the image of those dearest to They differed while on earth; perhaps one was greater, one was less; but the least of them now holds the key of a wisdom which was denied to Solomon and Socrates. So, doubtless, while among us he filled his place and was, if we but knew it, indispensable. Without him there would have been a little gap in the circumference; the great circle would have been notched and marred.

"Exaltavit humiles!" He has exalted the humble! These are the profoundest words ever speken, the seal and motto of eternal progress. They express the deepest lesson which we may learn from our colleagues who are here no more.

And to those Members of Congress who knew and loved JOHN NOLAN may I humbly say that some day, and not so far away, each and every one of us will be recalled only as a away, each and every one of as will be recalled all memory; for we know that "every life, no matter if its every hour is rich with love and every moment jeweled with a joy, will at its close become a tragedy as sad and deep and dark as can be woven of the warp and woof of mystery and death."

Again I summon to my aid the immortal words of Senator

Ingalls, when he said.

My only hope is that when the last survivor of us all recalls the vivid memories of those who have gone before, no grief may dim his vision, save that which separation always brings, and that he may confidently and gratefully anticipate the hour which shall summon him to a brighter world than this; a world which shall seem as the glorious wakening from a fevered dream, where sorrow has no dominion, where distance can not separate, where time can not chill, and the tragic limitations of earthly being are forever unknown.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, the true man can afford to defy death. Both the brain and the heart repudiate the suggestion that man is a perishable commodity. The brain refuses to admit that that which exists can cease to be, and the heart in its love refuses to concede that those we cherish will disappear

NOLAN represented an epoch in the life of the United States, the great Republic, the wonder of nations. He began his career when the prejudice against labor organizations was intense, when unrestrained individualism, taking full advantage of the inexhaustible resources of the land, flaunted every idea of cooperation among men; and while dollar and dollar were free to unite into corporations, it was deemed wrong for men and men to unite their hearts and souls in a common endeavor to improve the lot of the worker. The labor leader was treated with contempt. "The labor delegate" was a term of reproach. It was an honorable thing to be a director of a business corporation. It was a disreputable thing to be an agent of Noran challenged that prejudice. He was a believer in applied religion in the best sense of that term. Anyone can whisper a prayer inspired by the hope of future reward or by fear of future punishment. Anyone can go through the conventional forms of religious ceremony, but very few men lead a true religious life. Nonan devoted himself to the poor and oppressed. He gave them his talents, his energy, his soul. He was one of them; he never forgot them. Descending from a people who had suffered martyrdom at the hands of history, he allied himself with those who were handicapped in the struggle for existence. It is a privilege to trace one's origin to those who have known the pain of persecution. He who suffers loves, and he who loves is a man.

He understood the real value of education. He knew that the true object of acquiring knowledge should be the promotion of human happiness. Of what avail are our colleges and mu-seums and universities, of what good is it to ride the air and to put the eagle to scorn, of what value is it to plow the ocean with giant steamships, to cover the globe as with one nervous system by cable and by wireless, of what aid are all our inventions and discoveries, if we have not learned to live the lives of true men, if we have not learned to live the life of brotherhood, if we have not helped to establish cooperation between man and man? NoLAN was a devotee of the real religion—the religion of humanity. When I pay tribute to him I also pay tribute to the hosts of nameless comrades of his with whom he worked and who worked with him in the cause of labor, the cause of the human race,

Mr. WALTERS. Mr. Speaker, I do not come to-day to pay a perfunctory tribute to a Member of the Congress who passed away during his term of service. I come to say, in a formal way, and that they may be of record, a few of the expressions I am glad to have uttered during the lifetime-during the period of my association with John I. Nolan. I would not paint the life and career of our friend as that of a superman. Rather, it is better to note his intense human nature, his devotion to home, friends, and duty. It is better that we recall here the John NoLAN who worked along intensely practical lines, ever holding in view the betterment of humankind.

I met John I. Nolan in 1913, when we came to the first session of the Sixty-third Congress. We were members of a group which constituted a third party in this House. Those of us who hailed from the East were attracted to the earnest, eloquent, and always practical Member from San Francisco. Known to be a prominent figure in the labor-union movement, we expected to be associated with a radical exponent of the principles of that movement. Instead we found a level-headed, sane, practical man, firmly devoted to the interests of labor, contesting boldly and efficiently for those things demanded as a right by labor, yet always considerate, always regardful of the interests rights and privileges of all the people a right by labor, yet always considerate, always regardful of the interests, rights, and privileges of all the people.

An intimate association with John I. Nolan, official and personal, gave me a very high regard for his character and career. Making his way from the floor of the foundry to a high place in the union of his craft, overcoming difficulties and obstacles due to his lack of opportunity, he achieved leadership in his trade. He became an executive of one of the leading tradeunions of our country. In this high place his administration of the duties devolving upon him brought not only the confidence and trust of his fellow craftsmen, but the respect of employers. Firm in his relations with both workers and employers, always having in mind the welfare of the men in the foundries, he was regarded by employers as most just, as a safe counselor, and always a strict interpreter of agreements, demanding from those whom he represented the same scrupulous regard for a contract he expected from the employers.

Rightfully regarded as an able representative of labor, John I. Nolan did not assume that a great constituency expected him to devote all of his time and talents to the protection of the workers or the solving of industrial problems. He took care to be informed on all the leading questions of his day. As a legislator he ranked as one of the best informed men in the House. His connection with the organized-labor movement did not serve to dwarf his interest in all the problems which our Government was called upon to deal with. And, perhaps, no other tribute to his memory is more suggestive than that the people of the fifth California district voted him as their Representative in six Congresses practically without opposition. No finer tribute can come to a citizen than this exhibition of profound trust by a great body of his fellow Americans.

One's observation of home life, of the family relations and everyday work of a friend are not, as a rule, to be dwelt upon. I shall only remark that our friend Nolan fulfilled his obligations in these respects with a devotion of rare quality. We do

One's observation of home life, of the family relations and everyday work of a friend are not, as a rule, to be dwelt upon. I shall only remark that our friend Nolan fulfilled his obligations in these respects with a devotion of rare quality. We do not attempt to pose John I. Nolan as the superman. We wish to preserve his memory as a type of the American who rises superior to obstacles, who holds strong opinions without prejudices, who labors with intelligent zeal for the things he believes best for those with whom he is associated, yet ever has in mind duty and responsibility to all the people. So far as I am concerned, I hold John Nolan as a sincere and faithful friend. In the estimation of the world he must be held as, first, an American, sound to the core; and second, a considerate champion of labor, a skilled and impartial legislator, a man without guile, fearless and fair.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, the great State of California since it became a member of the galaxy of Commonwealths which go to form the American Union has produced many men of ability and distinction who have graced the Congress of the United States with membership therein, but among these not one has occupied a more unique position than that of our distinguished and beloved, departed colleague and friend, the late Hon. John I. Nolan, whose death we mourn and in whose memory these services are being held to-day.

His life was one of achievement and high purpose, not only because of the great zeal with which he served his State and Nation in his capacity here but for his unstinting devotion to the cause of the common people of which he and most of us in this body are a part.

He believed literally that this Republic of ours, founded upon the principle that the people of the United States who had first proclaimed the Republic and then ordained and established it under the Constitution, were those in whose interest the Government should be conducted, and that the preservation and perpetuity of our institutions depended upon the interpretation in thought and act which we, as representatives of the people in Congress, give to this theory.

Possessed of high ideals and patriotic enthusiasm for the Possessed of high ideals and patriotic enthusiasm for the cause of these plain, average citizens, not only of his district but of the Nation, his efforts were translated into practical achievements and were not merely confined to the sphere of academic contemplation.

His colleagues soon recognized his ability, grasped his pure purpose, and came to know that the man who possessed these fine qualities had a heart of pure gold. Having begun life at the bottom of the ladder, having toiled and labored as a member of that great mass of the common people who are the backbone of the Republic and who furnish the bone and sinew of its throbbing industrial life, he was one of them and knew as few men did their aims, hopes, and aspirations. These plain people, who, when he became a candidate for Congress in the first instance, backed him almost to a man, never had cause to regret their choice, and with each succeeding year gained in their enthusiasm for the loyalty, great ability, and high purpose of a member of their own ranks who had risen to high place in the councils of the Nation.

Not only did he maintain and increase the unfaltering devotion of labor and those who leaned toward it in their sympathies but he recruited to the cause many new adherents, and won the friendship and respect through the charm of his personality of all who came in contact with him. His position in this House at the time of his death, when he was not only the chairman of the great Committee on Labor but also a member of the powerful steering committee, is a mute tribute to the recognition which he received at the hands of his colleagues here.

He was an indefatigable worker, and with the dynamic energy and force which he threw into his work here he shattered his health and brought about his untimely end. He was truly a martyr to the cause of unselfish devotion to his fellows. His most precious possession—his life—he offered up on the altar of public service.

It is well known by those who knew him best that he was the very soul of modesty and was devoid of all pretense and ostentation. No boastful words ever passed his lips; no vindictiveness or bitterness ever contaminated his heart or mind. Forceful in expression, consistent in his views, he fought all his battles and met life's problems straight from the shoulder on the "live and let live" basis. Informed as few men were on the intricate problems affecting labor and industry in the complicated industrial age in which he lived, when he took the floor of the House to discuss this or any other kindred matter his colleagues knew that he knew what he was talking about and listened with close attention and in large measure followed his His master mind, tempered by legislative experience and fortified by the logic of facts which he had at his finger tips, seemed to endow him with the magic ability to rally support to the cause which he sponsored as few men could; and doubt if there has ever been a Member of this House who, single handed, wielded an influence to a cause to which he was devoted in such a degree as did John I. Nolan.

His loss not only to labor but to the Republican Party, of which he was a member, and to the Republic, of which he was a distinguished citizen, is almost irreparable. I prophesy it will be many years before his equal in knowledge and experience shall sit in his place here, and the voice that is stilled will long be felt in these halls in the influence which he left to this body as a heritage of his membership.

We are glad, indeed, that his wife has been selected to take his place and carry on the work which he left unfinished. She who was his helpmate and knew and sympathized with his point of view as no one else could can perhaps do more to perpetuate his memory and achievements in the years to come than anyone else, and I feel that it is the unanimous opinion of this body that his constituency honored itself when it honored her in electing her as his worthy successor.

It was my delight and pleasure to have known Mr. Noland in perhaps as intimate a way as it is possible for a new Member to know an older colleague. His helpful advice and counsel to me as one coming for the first time to take his place as an humble Member of the greatest parlimentary body in the world will long be remembered and always appreciated.

As a fellow Californian I had long known of his outstanding achievements here and of the high esteem in which he was held by the citizens of our State. Having been among those whose convictions and concepts of government had led to the political shrine of ideals sponsored by that great American, Theodore Roosevelt, where Mr. Nolan also had taken his inspiration, I found that we had been friends in purpose and comradeship long before we had become personally acquainted. We understood each other and spoke the same language.

The outstanding feature of Mr. Nolan's life was that in his private as well as his public life he placed human rights above property rights, and no measure which could not qualify under this and pass the acid test of his searching brain could obtain his support or approval. He dealt in fundamentals and believed that only when the welfare, life, prosperity, and happiness of the average citizen of the Republic was secure could the Republic endure and prosper and truly reflect the purposes for which it was ordained and established in the preamble of our Constitution.

Had he lived undoubtedly, in the course of time, he would have arrived at still higher pinnacles of achievement-the United States Senate, or membership in the Cabinet. It is well known that he was very favorably considered by President Harding for the position of Secretary of Labor under the present administration, but this only aroused a passive interest on the part of Mr. Nolan. He felt he had his work to accomplish here in the House and would not permit his friends to press his nomination.

Mr. Speaker, the 18th day of November, 1922, when our colleague departed this life to take up his abode eternal in the mansions of rest, was one upon which the Republic lost a distinguished citizen whose life, character, and public service will stand out in bold relief in the years to come as a beacon light and as an example to the youth and citizens of the Nation. He wrote his name high on the scroll of fame and it will live long in the annals of the Republic.

Farewell, friend; sacred be thy memory and peace eternal to thy soul.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, we have assembled here to-day in accordance with a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives, and in pursuance of a custom of parliamentary assemblies and legislative bodies, to commemorate the life, character, and services of John Nolan, once Member of Congress from the State of California.

This custom is derived from the past, and its origin is lost in the remoteness of time, for even from the twilight of history there come stories and traditions of great ceremonies and funeral rites suggesting the customs which we observe as a mode of expressing our grief and woe for the loss of those who at one time walked amidst us in glory.

From the antiquity of the ceremonies which are observed among all peoples it would appear that there has always existed a tendency to reverence the noble dead whose earthly existence became an inspiration to those who followed them and to give that tendency an outward form and expression. In Egypt's celebrated Book of the Dead, written more than 2,000 years before Joseph was sold into captivity and long before the dawn of Judaism had begun, there appeared these sublime words, taken from an inscription or epitaph on a monument erected to commemorate the virtue of some noble soul; he hath given a boat to the shipwreck; he hath buried the dead and made due offerings to the gods."
"He hath given bread to the hungry; clothes to the naked;

Memorial services certainly have now and will always in all probability have a powerful appeal to the imaginations of those who are left behind and who love to dwell upon the memories that come back like burning stars to dissipate the gloom of the day when the lamented one departed for the unknown country from whence no traveler ever returns. On such occasions it is impossible to repress our tears. Choking with heart sobs we endeavor to recall the touch of a vanished hand and the sound of a voice that is still. We grieve, we mourn for him who has bade the earth good-by forever. But we know that he is on another shore doing an even greater service than he performed

For it is impossible to believe the human mind is so consti-tuted that it staggers at the thought that the tongueless silence of the dreamless dust is the end of all our hopes and aspirations. God pity the man, God pity the woman, who believes that the grave is the end of all. For such a man, for such a woman, there is no peace in the twinkling of the stars, no lullaby in the prattle of children, no yearning in the soul to dwell beyond the milky way. In every age and in every clime and among all people there has always existed the pleasing hope that there is a land fairer and more beautiful than this. And the prophet who saw the coming of the new Jerusalem, with its gates of pearl, its streets of gold, its foundation of blazing jewels, its star-studded sky, corruscated with beautiful rainbows and gorgeous oriflames, only saw the vision that has been before the eyes of millions of human bubbles that have come and gone since creation's dawn.

The shepherd lad long before the days of the patriarchs witnessed the death of the wild flower beneath the chilling blast of a wintry wind, and he mourned not, for he knew that it would have a glorious resurrection under the influence of a gentle and balmy spring. Long before astronomy became a science he watched the stars in "their tracks" cross the heavens and disappear beneath the horizon, but he knew with a rapturous joy that he would behold them again. And to-day, when we are standing in the dazzling splendor of the strenuous life, when the ruthless hand of the iconoclast is on every altar, millions of the faithful answer the sneering agnosticism of the unbeliever with a sign of the cross and in the solemn grandeur of Him who died on Calvary Hill.

I am the resurrection and the life. He that believeth in Me, though he be dead, yet shall he live.

If an all wise Father deigns to touch with divine power the cold and pulseless heart of the buried acorn and make it burst from its prison walls will He neglect the soul of man, who is made in the image of his Creator? If He stoop to give the last rose of summer, whose withered petals float upon the autumn's wind, the sweet assurance of another springtime, will He withhold the words of hope from the sons of men when the frost of winter comes? If matter, mute and inanimate, though it may be changed by the forces of nature into a multitude of forms, can never die, will the imperial spirit of man suffer annihilation after the tenement of clay has been resolved into earth again?

Rather let us believe that the Creator, who in his apparent prodigality wastes not the raindrops, the blade of grass, or the evening breeze, but makes them all carry out His great eternal plan, will direct, transport us to the land that is fairer than this, and which by faith we can see from afar, and vision through the whisperings and intimations of immortality.

The terrible worldiness of the Persian poet, to take the cash and let the credit go, nor heed the rumble of a distant drum, receives an answer in his own immortal lines:

I sometimes think that never blew so red the rose, As where some buried Caesar bled, And every hyacinth the garden bears Dropped in her lap from some once lovely head.

Volney, Voltaire, Paine, and Ingersoll are confused and confounded by the meditations of Cato contemplating death:

The stars may fade away,
The sun himself grow dlm with age,
And nature sink in tireless years,
But thou, O Immortality,
Shall live on forever
Unburt amid the wreck of matter
And the crash of worlds.

And it must be so, else what a mournful picture is presented to the human mind by the purposeless existence of the innumerable caravans that have come and gone since paradise, and will come and go-

Until the sun grows cold, And the stars are old, And the leaves of the judgment book unfold.

Even to the most stoical or philosophical when there is no hope of another life the picture is infinitely pathetic and picturesque. Life is a little plot of light. We enter, clasp a hand or two, smile, drop a tear, sing a song, send forth a sigh, and then go out into the everlasting darkness again. The great consolation, however, is that we do know with our declining years that our shadows reach the stars.

God moves in mysterious ways His wonders to perform. He did not send out the great benevolent soul of John Nolan on its wonderful mission until He saw fit in His inscrutable wisdom and have His servant do the noble things which he did in the brief time that was allotted to him on this earth. But that immortal spirit would have been a hero in the strife and would have worked unceasingly for the elevation of his brother and would have been a blessing to mankind had he been sent into the world at the very dawn of history or had his coming been delayed until that remote period which will be the last days of man on this earth, just before the sun will lose its grip upon the globe and our old world goes flying out of its orbit and speeds on to its destruction and oblivion through trackless space. His would have been the voice lifted in behalf of justice, fair play, benevolence as the best means of justifying one's existence, as bringing contentment, peace, and happiness as far as they may be achieved on this earth to the hearts and minds of men and women. He loved his fellow man and therefore loved his Creator. While he reverenced the God we all adore with touching humility, he was always mindful of the wondrous beauty of the attitude that makes for the doing of a great and noble act without hope of reward or fear of punishment. I remember relating to him on one occa-sion a story which I heard years ago and which I have never been able to trace to its literary source. It is the story of the virgin who in a day of remote antiquity walked the walls of an ancient city carrying in one hand a blazing torch and in the other a pail of water, chanting and singing incessantly her great, alluring song:

With this torch I will burn the heavens, And with this pail of water I will extinguish the fires of hell, So that God may be loved for himself alone, Without hope of reward or fear of punishment.

My friend, for he was my friend, immediately said to me: "Jim, that is a beautiful story and I wish when you find the book in which it is that you will give me its title." I know you will believe me when I tell you that that refrain, though perhaps not those words, has been ringing in my ears from my earliest days. Yes, he lived to bless mankind, to make the world a little better and brighter for his presence; he struggled, worked, and toiled to let in the light where darkness had been, to bring hope where sorrow frowned and dwelled, to dry the eye of the orphan, to subdue discord, to still the heartaches of myriads, to alleviate the anguish that tortured the soul of millions. That was the great soul-inspiring task that appealed to his imaginative and benevolent nature. Oh, it was great—and there is no other greatness. Such a life so spent and in such a work lifts one nearer, nearer to the great white throne of God.

Aye, death does not mean annihilation. Buddhism, with its Nirvana, which seeks through the door of life death and extinction, is a creed to us repellant. What a contrast there is between it and the Christian faith which teaches that through the shadow of the grave there comes life—everlasting, eternal life!

Our friend is not dead; he lives and in a wider sphere seeks growth and development and service and achievement. His life was rich in service and his labors enriched his State and the Nation and added to the great reservoir of humanity's achievement. A strong, brave, chivalrous man has gone from our midst. His memory we will cherish in our hearts; his labors will live after him. He has gone to join those illustrious spirits who in the night of despotism foresaw the glories of the coming day. We miss the friend we loved, whose memory we reverence. Our hearts are sore and heavy and there is no adequate speech for the deep emotions of the soul. The staff has been taken from a strong right hand and the left is cold and smitten. Next to his fireside the world had his loving regard and solicitude.

In this historic Hall the association of years cluster, and here he consecrated his power with the sacrament of unstinted toil in the interest and for the advancement of the wage-earning hosts of his country. A tower of strength has left us, but he still speaks to us from the tomb. His whisper is again in our ears:

Let all the ends thou aim'st at be Thy country's, thy God's, and truth's. Be noble and the nobleness that Lies in other men, sleeping, but Never dead. will rise in majesty To meet thine own.

My dirge hath ceased, my eyes are dim, my voice will soon be with the echoes. Let me close with a recitation of the immortal Thanatopsis, lines that will never die, a sermon in deathless verse that will sustain men and women in all the centuries to come with an unfaltering hope that they will meet their pilot face to face when they have crossed the bar. Wonderfully philosophical, they inspire one to dream and to think not only of the manly part we should play upon this earth, which John Nolan played out in the grand drama of life, but they inspire us to look beyond and to contemplate our journey into that new land of adventure, into that higher sphere of action, bravely and embark as the gallant souls of the world would have us go. That vision of death would have immortalized William Cullen Bryant and added to the literature of the English-speaking people if he had never written anything else, though his other poems place his name high among the choice spirits of America:

of America:

To him who in the love of Nature holds Communion with her visible forms, she speaks
A various language; for his gayer hours
She has a voice of gladness, and she glides
Into his darker musings with a mild
And healing sympathy that steals away
Their sharpness ere he is aware. When thoughts
Of the last bitter hour come like a blight
O'er thy spirit, and sad images
Of the stern agony, and shroud, and pall,
And breathless darkness, and the narrow house,
Make thee to shudder and grow sick at heart,
Go forth under the open sky and list
To Nature's teachings, while from all around—Earth and her waters and the depths of air—
Comes a still voice: Yet a few days, and thee
The all-beholding sun shall see no more
In all his course, nor yet in the cold ground
Where thy pale form was laid with many tears,
Nor in the embrace of ocean, shall exist
Thy image. Earth, that nourished thee, shall claim Thy growth, to be resolved to earth again,
And, lost each human trace, surrendering up
Thine individual being, shalt thou go
To mix forever with the elements,
To be a brother to the insensible rock
And to the sluggish clod which the rude swain

Turns with his share and treads upon. The oak Shall send his roots abroad and pierce thy mold. Yet not to thine eternal resting place Shalt thou retire alone, nor couldst thou wish Couch more magnificent. Thou shalt lie down
With patriarchs of the infant world, with kings,
The powerful of the earth—the wise, the good,
Fair forms, and hoary seers of ages past,
All in one mighty sepulcher. The hills,
Rock-ribbed and ancient as the sun—the vales Stretching in pensive quietness between;
The venerable woods—rivers that move
In majesty, and the complaining brooks
That make the meadows green; and, poured round all,
Old ocean's gray and melancholy waste,
Are but the solemn decorations all
Of the great tomb of man. The golden sun,
The planets, all the lininite host of heaven,
Are shining on the sad abodes of death.
Through the still lapse of ages. All that tread
The globe are but a handful to the tribes
That slumber in its bosom. Take the wings
Of morning, pierce the Barcan wilderness.
Or lose thyself in the continuous woods
Where rolls the Oregon, and hears no sound,
Save his own dashings—yet the dead are there:
And millions in those solitudes, since first
The flight of years began, have laid them down
In their last sleep—the dead reign there alone.
So shalt thou rest, and what if thou withdraw
In slience from the living, and no friend
Take note of thy departure? All that breathe
Will share thy destiny. The gay will laugh
When thou art gone, the solemn brood of care
Plod on, and each one as before will chase
His favorife phantom; yet all these shall leave Their mirth and their employments, and shall come
And make their bed with thee. As the long train
Of ages glides away, the soms of men,
The youth in life's fresh spring, and he who goes
In the full strength of years, matron and maid,
The speechless babe, and the gray-headed man—
Shall one by one be gathered to thy slée,
By those who in their turn shall follow them.

So live, that when thy summons comes to join

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, when death has taken from us a friend whom we esteem and love, there remains only for us the sad but sweet privilege of laying flowers upon the grave of the dead. In that sense I want to pay a tribute to the memory of a trusted friend. John Nolan, as has been said again and again to-day, was an iron molder. He was, however, an educated man; not educated in the schools, but educated like Washington, like that Connecticut shoemaker, Roger Sherman, who helped draft the Declaration of Independence and to frame our Constitution; like Andrew Jackson, the great soldier; and like Abraham Lincoln, taught in the hard school of experience, and self-taught. But he was for all that an educated and cultivated man, with a broad knowledge of books and of men and of the world.

He came to Congress from a district which appreciated him.

He came to Congress from a district which appreciated him. He came six times by a practically unanimous vote of his constituents. His district knew him and it trusted him. He represented not only the wage earners but every man in his great district, and he represented every citizen of his great State. He was broad enough and great enough and true enough to represent the whole country. We know it; and we who knew him loved him because he did it. He was wise; he was tactical; he was brave; he was truthful; he was loyal; and he knew men. He had the art of persuasion; he understood how to get results in this great body, where it is harder to get results for the individual than from anything on earth, but he got them.

He was in the Sixty-fifth Congress chairman of the Committee on Patents, a committee which requires technical knowledge and knowledge of mechanics, a knowledge of the law, a knowledge of invention, a knowledge of a great many things which are not common knowledge, and all of these John Nolan had and had taught himself. He was a great chairman of that committee. He left it to become chairman of the Committee on Labor, and he made a great chairman of the Committee on Labor.

When he was the ranking member of the Committee on Labor in the Sixty-sixth Congress he got through his minimum wage act, he got through many other bills in the interest of wage earners, which occupied much of his time and much of his effort, and yet, as chairman of the Committee on Patents, it was my privilege to go to him for the American Bar Association (being a member of one of its committees) to discuss with him certain laws which he himself drafted, which he himself introduced, and which he himself succeeded in persuading the House and the other body to enact into law that which the lawyer chairmen who had preceded him as chairmen of that committee had for 20 years failed in passing. Two or three laws passed in the Sixty-sixth Congress through the wisdom, knowledge of mankind and knowledge of mechanics and knowledge of human nature, tact, and diplomacy of John NoLAN became laws and are the laws to-day, for which he is entitled to the credit, and which are a benefit to every citizen in America. He has done much for labor, he has done much for the whole country, and we honor him and love him for what he did. There is left to his widow, who sits with us to-day as his successor, and to his daughter the assurance that a Christian gentleman awaits them beyond the Great Divide. left to everyone of us the knowledge that you and I take pride in the fact that we knew and loved a brave, great, and

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, the career of Congressman JOHN I. NOLAN might serve as an inspiration to any young His was a typically American career. NOLAN at his birth was not endowed with the proverbial silver spoon. He first saw the light of day under circumstances similar to those of many of his countrymen. He was not born and did not grow to manhood amidst luxurious surroundings. mosphere of his birth and of his youth was such as to impress upon him the necessity of hard work in any undertaking and in the accomplishment of any worth-while end. John Nolan worked hard during his lifetime and won for himself honor and success. The opportunities that were his are the oppor-tunities of every young American. What he accomplished others can accomplish by emulating his honesty, courage, and JOHN I. NOLAN loved his country and his fellow man. I once heard him say on the floor of this House that in no other country was the opportunity afforded for a man to rise as he country was the opportunity afforded for a man to rise as he had risen and to reach a position of trust and influence such as he had attained. In making that statement John Nolan was not glorifying himself. He was attesting his love and admiration for his country and the opportunities that it affords.

I had learned to admire John Nolan before I knew him. When he was first elected to Congress I was impressed by his attitude toward legislation. As his career continued I even more favorably impressed by his activities and the things for which he stood. When later I joined him as a member of the California delegation in Congress I was glad to know personally the man whom I had already come to admire, and I soon counted him as one of my best friends in this House. He was ever graciously helpful, and his ideas and opinions were always enlightening.

JOHN I. NOLAN was one to whom the human element in legislation and government always appealed. He was the earnest advocate of laws which would better the conditions under which men and women labor and live. His heart was always with those who toil and bear the burdens of civilization. He sought to bring greater comfort and happiness into the lives of the people who labor. They have lost a real friend.

He was known as a spokesman of labor on this floor, and as such his record was one of accomplishment. His honesty and courage and withal his absolute fairness won for him the respect and admiration of every Member of this House. He was always broad-minded and generous, and his views were accepted, and he succeeded where a less tolerant advocate would have failed. He occupied a position of strength and honor in the Congress of the United States.

JOHN NOLAN'S home life was in every way worthy of admiration. His love for and devotion to his wife and child and his consideration for their happiness and comfort evidenced his true He was a lover of athletic sports, and I recall with pleasure the occasions upon which I attended such events with

The esteem in which he was held by his constituents and the people of his State is made manifest by the positions of honor and trust that were conferred upon him. His elections to Congress, practically without opposition, attest the high regard in which he was held by his people and their confidence in him.

By his death the people of his district and the State of California have lost a worthy and capable Representative. Labor has lost an effective and honored advocate; the men and women who toil, a true and ardent friend. In the passing of John I. Nolan the Congress of the United States has lost a Member whose place will be difficult to fill. His work here will live long and men and women will be benefited because he lived and served in this House.

Mr. FREE. Mr. Speaker, for the fourth time since the elections of 1920 the Angel of Death has appeared at the door of the California delegation, and to-day we are here to honor the memory of one of those who has been taken. In a service of this kind we are face to face with death. Death is always accompanied with broken hearts and tears. It is always an occasion of sadness. Death, this thing that is universal, the thing that is just as certain to come to us as the fact that we are born; death that has taken countless millions who have gone before, stands to us an unsolved problem, and although orators have declaimed and preachers have explained, somehow out of the distance we get but the echo that some day we will understand. It is always hard for those who are left; it is hard to understand why it was their loved one who was taken, as in the case of John I. Nolan, a man in the most vigorous manhood, mentally and physically, serving a human purpose, doing a good to this world, fond of his family, devoted husband and father. Yet the hand of death has fallen upon him. We might question whether it is right, whether it is just, why it is so? We might have our doubts about the fairness of the make-up of life, but if we turn for a moment in this winter season, when all is bleak and dark, do we throw away hope? Do we abandon ourselves to the thought that never again will the flowers bloom? We are just as certain that after this cold, bleak, and barren winter has gone there will come awakening spring, and then will follow summer with its flowers, which in turn will wither in the fall, and again will winter come. Do we ever look upon the setting sun in the west and doubt that again on the morrow it will rise in the east? Do we ever look into the great firmament of heaven and see the myriads of stars and not wonder at the amazing regularity of it all? If we would but think of these things we must realize that above and be-yond our own minds and fancies there is a great and control-ling power that directs our activities, as it directs all the affairs of life.

I feel that in some way the eyes that have been washed with tears will come to have a clearer vision of the beauty of holi-ness and of service and of God. I saw in the gallery to-day a loyal Californian, Doctor Wilbur, president of the great Leland Stanford Junior University, and as I saw him here it brought to my mind one of the great things that came out of grief and Senator and Mrs. Stanford were perhaps in their early life in a way a bit self-satisfied. They had all of the world's goods that they wanted. God gave to them a son. In educating that son they took him to Europe that he might have every advantage of travel. While there the lad was stricken with fever and their boy was taken away from them. Then it was and over his bier that they declared they would give to the children of California an opportunity to make something of themselves in life, and they gave up their fortunes to that end. I well remember the time when on account of a legal situation that had arisen Mrs. Stanford took the very jewels from her breast and pawned them in order that the university might be kept open. I remember when she dismissed her help in order that she might devote the funds she had to that great institution. So I say, my friends, that out of this thing called death, this thing we can not understand, and out of aching hearts, come some of the greatest things and the greatest treasures and the greatest thoughts of life.

So, John I. Nolan is gone. He was born in the city of San Francisco, overlooking San Francisco Bay, out upon the great Pacific, born there in a land that he aways loved, born, as has been said to-day, with no great advantage for a youth.

At the age of 9 he could have been seen as a cash boy in a

San Francisco department store. At the age of 20 he was an iron molder, standing well in his trade. At that time he had seen the human side of life and had determined that through organization his coworkers might succeed, and this boy of 20 his way to recognition in the union to which he belonged. What might have been considered his goal was reached in 1912, when he was elected secretary of the San Francisco Labor Council. Another goal was attained when in 1911 he was appointed to the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, but no—his goal had not been reached, and in 1913 he was elected a Member of Congress. As has been said here to-day he was reelected to the Sixty-fourth, the Sixty-fifth, the Sixty-sixth, the Sixty-seventh, and to the Congress that has not yet come into existence. When he came here he did not abandon the thoughts of his younger life, but he sought a place upon the Committee on Labor, where he thought he might do good for those with whom he had labored and whose problems he understood, and it was the crowning ambition of his life when he ultimately became chairman of that committee.

He has always remained a member of the board of the International Molders' Union; never did he turn away from the occupation of his early youth. He was always proud of the fact that he had come up by effort. It is difficult to describe a man of the type of John Nolan. He was fearless, he was never afraid to say what he thought, he was forceful, he was gracious, he was well informed and observing. He was one of the hardest fighters I have ever known, and yet he was one of the kindest and one of the most humane men it has ever been my privilege to meet. He always espoused the cause of the distressed and those who needed help. He was always helping those who were not as fortunate as he had been.

His home life was ideal. No hours of his life were so happy as when he was in that home. It was in this very Hall, when the Queen of Belgium sat in the gallery and called for his little daughter to come to her, that he had one of the happiest moments of his life. He was loyal to the State in which he was born; he loved it. He advanced its interests. May I conclude with just these few words and in them epitomize the life work.

of John I. Nolan:

When your life of toll is over,
And you've done all you can do,
Did you treat the other fellow
As you would have him treat you?

If you did, your life's a blessing,
For how often we forget
To meet the other fellow
As we wish to be met.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Nolan took an active interest in all legislation coming before Congress during his membership here. Naturally alert and interested in public affairs generally, he took his part with other Members in all matters of general interest. However, the outstanding feature in the congressional career of Mr. Nolan was his devotion to the cause of the man who toils. Mr. Nolan himself reached mature manhood in the ranks of labor. He understood the human, practical, and life problems of the men who toil. The cause of labor, the ideals for which the laboring men may legitimately aspire, found sympathetic, zealous support in the heart and mind of Mr. Nolan. His aggressive espousal of the cause of labor placed him in a position of leadership in labor's cause.

Before Mr. Nolan came to Congress, however, he had a background of experience in public affairs that prepared him for the larger duties and opportunities that congressional membership afforded. He had the sympathy, understanding, and devotion to the laboring man's cause. He had the experience, tactfulness, and sense of proportion that can be gained only by contact with men in the broader affairs of life.

Mr. Nolan represented one of the strongest labor districts in the United States. By training, disposition, and duty he became peculiarly a missionary advocate and defender of labor in the Halls of Congress. Experience has shown that such is a difficult responsibility. Ordinarily the Member who is so committed to the advocacy of an especial cause finds it difficult to maintain his prestige in this House and avoid extreme and impossible positions that detract from his ultimate usefulness. But now, when the career of Mr. Nolan is ended, it is the unanimous judgment of the membership of this House that he pursued a course unquestionably loyal to those he represented and gave a service useful and effective not only in their behalf but to his country generally.

What is this cause of labor to which Mr. Nolan was devoted? It is an old cause, a great cause. Six centuries ago laborers were serfs, denied the privilege of working for wages, and the right to their labor passed with the transfer of the lands of their masters. The black death ran its course in England, and when its ravages ended more than half of the population had perished. In many instances masters of great estates, with all their heirs, had perished. Their serfs were released from their bendage for the lack of a master. Under these circumstances our system of free and competitive labor originated. Still for great periods of time the free right of labor to contract or compete or combine for higher wages was limited or contested by law.

Mr. Nolan knew that for a century or more the effective cause of the workingman's advancement has been organized labor. He knew that it was largely through the cooperative efforts of laboring men that better working conditions had been provided, that sanitary and safety equipment and appliances have been required by law, and that through such united efforts labor has received a larger proportion of its product. Mr. Nolan knew that organized labor had given to the individual workingman a higher degree of respect and new strength for his advancement and the redress of his wrongs.

Mr. Nolan espoused labor's cause not because it furnished an easy opportunity of self-promotion but because of his deep conviction of its merits. In his devotion to the cause of labor, to any cause, and to his friends, his effort was ever characterized by the sincerity and positive loyalty of an upstanding man.

The conflict of labor into which Mr. Nolan entered, as I have indicated, is not a new one. It is not one that is soon going to be ended. To a considerable degree what labor secures in the way of more favorable conditions and better wages is gained at the expense of the employer. The advancement of labor means a different division of the products of labor, the employer taking less and the employee taking more. There is a conflict of interest that is inherent and that can not be eliminated by any legislation or administrative provisions. Organized society may justly restrain each and protect innocent, nonparticipating third parties affected by resulting controversies. Manifestly each side should be justly restrained. Employment can not continue without appropriate return, and labor, too, is entitled to a fair proportion of that return; but that is beside the question of this hour. Sufficient to say that labor has had a real cause and rights to be advocated and defended. Of those Mr. Nolan

If we judge organized labor only by its mistakes, it would be utterly condemned; but, like all other movements, that organization must be judged as we judge an individual man. average man does good; he inflicts wrongs; he makes mistakes; he is sometimes ungrateful; he neglects opportunities; sometimes he is cruel in his judgment of others; sometimes he lacks courage to do his duty; selfishness may sometimes dominate his These faults are all chargeable to the average man, motives. but on the whole he has been a good husband and father, a useful man and a good citizen. We grant him two sides of the ledger; we subtract his deficiencies and judge him by his aggregate worth. Mr. NoLAN sought to be the advocate of the just causes of labor. He sought to avoid and minimize its mistakes and contribute to its just success. He, too, like all men, might err in his judgment; but he well earned the tribute due those who have the fidelity and the courage to perform their duty as it was given to them to see it. Those who knew him best appreciated him most. We may justly claim for him a high place of appreciation in our memories.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker, it is not easy for me to find words to express the promptings of my heart when I rise to speak in honor of the memory of a man I loved. JOHN I. NOLAN Was my friend, and the friendship of such a man was worth while having, for he was a real friend. No one in his presence could speak disparagingly of a friend of his without at once evoking a vigorous reply. To some he may have seemed to have had a rough and rugged exterior, but if so, it only partly concealed a heart as big, as warm, and as tender as ever beat in the breast of any man. It is easy to praise him, for all who knew him speak well of him, even those who differed most sharply with him in his views on public questions. And yet John Nolan never trimmed his sails for any man. He was a naturalborn fighter, for his whole life is the story of a constant uphill fight. I have never seen on the floor of this House a better example of an upstanding, outspoken, hard-hitting, two-fisted fighter. And yet he always fought fair and in the open. He was so honorable and aboveboard in his dealings, he was so sincere and conscientious in his convictions, that he won the respect and esteem of even those who opposed him most,

Early in life he was thrown on his own resources and left to make his own way in the world. Thus he came to this Chamber without having had many of those early advantages that most Members have been privileged to enjoy. But he was a rugged and sturdy oak and possessed enduring qualities that soon made him one of the outstanding figures of this House.

In these legislative halls he soon became the recognized leader of labor, from whose ranks he sprang, and the toiling, inarticulate masses who work with their hands never had a more loyal and faithful friend, a more valiant defender, and a more zealous and forceful advocate. And yet while he was sent here as the representative of labor, he took no narrow or partisan view of the issues that affected the welfare of the Nation, but charted his course by a compass which indicated where the best interests of the whole people lie. He was big enough, broad enough, and statesmanlike enough that when he differed with the labor organizations, as he sometimes did, as to the wise course to pursue, he did not hesitate to tell them, and if he was unable to persuade them to his way of thinking, he followed the course dictated by his own conscience.

We have all had frequent occasions to admire his courage and devotion to his cause and observe with what tenacity he stood up for the things he believed to be right, unmoved by the fact that the crowd thought otherwise, and having once chosen his ground, he stood there, undismayed, even though alone, buttressed about by the consciousness that he was doing the right as God gave him the light to see it. Would that there were more men to serve their country like John Nolan did! In his untimely death the State of California has lost an honored Representative, labor a champion, and the Nation a statesman. It was a just and fitting tribute to his memory and a proper token of the love and esteem in which he was held by the people who knew him best that on his death his constituency should have promptly and by a large majority chosen his widow, whom we all know and respect, to fill his place and to carry on the work to which his life had been dedi-

Mr. MacLAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, it would seem that further words on the subject of our friend and colleague would be simple verbiage, but I do want to express one thought here that will apply in the case of all of our colleagues, and I wish, if possible, that my remarks be made particularly to apply in the ceremonies for John I. Nolan and Mr. Osborne. You know, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I believe that those men are just as busy now as when they were here. To me anything else would seem to be but a ghastly joke, and I refuse to think that a man who has come up from boyhood through hardships, a man who has been taught by adversity, by hard knocks, and reaches his maturity and is called on-I refuse to believe that he has entered into the mansions of rest, or that he has gone to oblivion. But I believe he is but carrying on the work for which he was fitting himself. I can not believe anything else. And I think I know enough about John I. Nolan and I think I know enough about Henry Z. Osborne to know that somewhere they are busy doing the work that they prepared them-selves for when among us. That has been a belief of mine for a long time, and I am going to repeat just a few lines—I am going to offer them-as a tribute to these two men, and as a thought which I hope will be a consoling one to those who mourn, because most of our mourning is selfish; we mourn most for ourselves. Who of us would, if he had the power allowed him, call back one who has gone on?

It is not fitting I should seek thee, Death; And yet 'tis seemly I should welcome thee When thou shalt call, and greet thee as a friend. And kindlier is my thought of thee, because For years I feared, misjudged, misunderstood Thy meaning, nor did comprehend the boon so oft conferred by thee.

Thus being held Before my sight a terror, sund'ring wide, Dissolving tend'rest ties, I heard thee called "Grim Reaper," a "Destroying Angel"; so, I feared to look upon the face of one On whom thy hand was laid. I shunned to walk E'en near the brink, to dart a furtive glance Into the self-created gloom we call The Valley of thy Shadow.

Now I know Thee as thou truly art. Methinks I see Thee through the eyes of those who long have prayed That thou wouldst come to end a hopeless day Of pain, unending till relieved by thee. And I have watched beside the bed of one Whose years were many, and whose light had burned So deep within its socket that the flame Itself appeared the shadow of a flame. Each new-born day I saw him grieve because Thy wings had not been folded o'er his couch For one sweet moment, then thy flight renewed, His weary spirit borne by thee afar To other worlds, and hope for better things. And I have seen thee fold in thy embrace A form so fair my words could ill describe Her beauty; yet where dwelt a soul who longed To be away with thee; who saw the sea Of years ahead, then saw the dream of life A shattered wreck along its breaking shore, And shrank to breast the storm. And when thou cam'st To her I saw the answering smile o'erspread Her face and heard her answer unafraid. Yea, Death! To hosts unnumbered hast thou been A messenger of light, an angel fair Of mercy. Thou hast freed the hopeless slave, And ended weary exile by thy touch.

The martyr at the stake hath prayed for thee, And happy in his torture, raised his song Because of thine approach.

So. Angel Death, Though life is sweet, and while I seek thee not, Inough the is sweet, and while I seek the I pray that I may yet abide thy call In perfect peace; in calm tranquillity Of soul; while not rejoicing, yet as bold To go as to remain. As glad to solve The riddle as to blindly thread its maze; And with abiding faith that I may trust, As now, so then, the One whose messenger Thou art, to lead me through the open gates Of immortality.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Burke] had hoped to be present to-day and pay a tribute to the memory of Congressman NoLAN. He has, however, been detained to-day by illness, and I ask unanimous consent that he be allowed to extend his remarks, if that re-

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, we have assembled here to-day to pay tribute to the memory of one of California's noblest sons and one of America's great statesmen, John I. Nolan.

Summoned to his eternal home in the very prime of life,
John Nolan went to his Maker with a record of untold good

JOHN NOLAN went to his Maker with a record of untold good and of duty well and faithfully performed.

A man of ability; a man of integrity, he commanded the respect and admiration of everyone with whom he came in contact. Emanating from the great throbbing masses of humanity, he still in high life remained part of the masses, and was true to the cause of the masses. Actuated by high ideals, animated by lofty purposes, John Nolan stood out a commanding figure in the work of the Nation. On the floor of this House he was ever found fighting for the cause of justice and righteousness. Where principle was involved, where justice to the common people was concerned, there was no comtice to the common people was concerned, there was no com-promise with Nolan, and those of us who served with him here and heard his voice knew when he spoke he advocated the cause of justice.

Mr. BARBOUR assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, there are times when words fail to express the feelings of the heart and the sentiments of the mind. This is one of those occasions for me. I knew John I. NOLAN intimately and well from his boyhood to the time of his death. We were friends, companions, and associates during all those years, and I never knew a better, a truer, a more conscientious, or a more loyal man in private or in public life.

It has been said that Republics are ungrateful. John I. Nolan's career refutes that statement and proves that the people are delighted to honor with their trust and preferment trustworthy and dependable men, such as he. His constituents, his State, his country, and humanity suffered a personal loss in what seems to us his untimely death.

JOHN I. NOLAN was born in San Francisco, Calif., January 14, 1874, being the son of James and Sarah Nolan. His parents were honest, sober, industrious, God-fearing people. His father was unexcelled in his line of work. He was a good provider. His family was loving and harmonious. James and Sarah Nolan were consistent members of the Catholic Church and by example and precept they raised their children as good Christians. The faith of his fathers JOHN I, NOLAN carried with him through life with an unquestioning belief. He lived and died a good Christian, devoting his extraordinary talents to bettering the mental, moral, and material conditions of the wage earner and in advocating and initiating humanitarian

He received a common-school education in the public schools of San Francisco. At the age of 9 he was for a time employed as a cash boy; at 14 he entered the molding trade as an apprentice and became so expert that he had no superior at his As soon as he was eligible he became a member of the Molders' Union. His extraordinary talents as an organizer and harmonizer, his ability in debate, his logical mind and his fund of accurate information on industrial conditions were soon recognized by his associates and he was elected sec retary of the local union of the craft and later an officer of the International Molders' Union of North America, which latter position he held for 14 years and until his death.

For a number of years he was secretary and legislative agent of the San Francisco Labor Council. In that capacity he advocated, supported, or initiated much of the humanitarian legislation on the statute books of California, and which has caused that State to be recognized as one of the most progressive States in the world. His first public office was that of supervisor, to which he was appointed by Mayor P. H. McCarthy in 1911 to fill a vacancy caused by the resignation McLaughlin, who had been appointed State labor commissioner by Governor (now Senator) HIRAM W. JOHNSON. Mayor McCarthy had been elected on the labor ticket. one of the organizers of the building trades council and was its president from its organization until 1922, when he refused to be a candidate for reelection and retired. He made a great mayor; one of the best San Francisco has ever had. There were many candidates for the vacant supervisorship, but JOHN I. NOLAN was not one of the number. He was surprised when the position was offered to him, but he accepted and his appointment was pleasing to all. Labor and capital were both satisfied, and even those who had sought the appointment commended the mayor's action.

John I. Nolan never encouraged a strike. He knew they were occasionally necessary, but believed a strike was only justifiable after all other recourses had failed. He settled many strikes and threatened strikes. In those settlements the rights of labor were always protected, but he was so eminently fair and just, and he had the confidence of employer and employee to such an extent that in the end both sides to the controversy accepted his decision as an arbitrator.

As a supervisor John I. Nolan made good. He performed his duty with courage, ability, and with incorruptible honesty. He soon became a leader in the board. He studied and mastered the details of the city's business and was the friend and defender of the common people. He soon had a state-wide reputation as an authority on municipal government.

In 1911 the Legislature of California reapportioned the congressional districts of the State on the basis of the 1910 census. A new district—the fifth—was carved out of a portion of San Francisco. The people, by an overwhelming majority, nominated John I. Nolan as their Representative in Congress as a Republican and Progressive at the 1912 primary. He was elected by an immense majority at the general election in November of that year and was reelected every two years thereafter by increased majorities, usually without serious opposition.

Last year while confined to his bed with a fatal illness he was renominated and reelected a Representative to the Sixtyeighth Congress without opposition on any ticket. At the organization of the Sixty-third Congress he was made a member of the Committees on Labor, Patents, Insular Affairs, and Woman Suffrage, of which committees he continued to be a member until his death. During this Congress he was also a member of the powerful partisan steering committee. He from the first took an active interest in legislation and particularly in matters referred to those committees. He took a great interest in legislation affecting the Philippines and our other insular possessions, assisted materially in reporting and passing the nineteenth or so-called woman suffrage amendment to the Constitution and in humanitarian and labor bills referred to the Committee on Labor. The reporting and passing of much of the beneficial legislation referred to that committee was due to his untiring efforts and able arguments. He initiated many of the humanitarian laws now on the statute books of the Nation. He made an unremitting fight against child labor, for laws providing for the welfare of women in industry, for his $3-a-day minimum Federal wage bill, and for that portion of the Federal employees that are underpaid. During the last two years of his life he was chairman of the Committee on Labor of the House; during the previous term he had been the chairman of the Committee on Patents.

John I. Nolan was born with an iron constitution. He was mentally, morally, and physically strong, but his unceasing and tireless work for the people overtaxed his strength, strong man as he was. For years he was in failing health, but when his friends and physicians advised him to take a rest and recover his health he replied that his duty to the people and to labor was of more importance than his health, and he continued his work for them as long as his physical strength would permit. Three months before his death he became so weak and sick that his wife took him home to San Francisco, where he died November 18, 1922.

JOHN I. NOLAN was a hero, a martyr to duty; by overwork in the line of duty he sacrificed his life for the welfare of the working classes of his country and of the world. He was the great leader of labor in Congress and was at the same time one of the foremost statesmen in the country—ready, plausible, insistent, tireless, and fair in debate.

His minimum wage bill and the child labor amendment to the Constitution he did not live to see enacted; but his minimum wage bill passed the House three times and a child labor law was enacted twice, both to be held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. We regret he was not spared long enough to see the fruition of his labor, for the ultimate success of both measures are morally certain.

While not unexpected, his death was a shock to Congress and to the people of his native city and State. He was buried on Wednesday, November 22, with impressive military and civic honors, in which city, State, and Nation joined. The body lay in state at the city hall, with military and police guards of honor. The Nation's and the city's tributes were expressed in addresses by United States Senator Hiram W. Johnson, and by Hon. James Rolph, jr., mayor of San Francisco. Religious services were held later at St. Mary's Cathedral, where a requiem high mass for the repose of the soul of the dead was celebrated by Archbishop Edward J. Hanna. It was one of the most impressive and largest attended funerals ever held in San Francisco. The interment was in Holy Cross Cemetery, in San Mateo County. Among the mourners were members of the Molders' Union, Knights of Columbus, Loyal Order of Moose, Twin Peaks Parlor Native Sons of the Golden West, and the Hibernians, and the leading business, labor, newspaper, and professional men and officials of the city. State, and Nation.

professional men and officials of the city, State, and Nation.

John I. Nolan was married to Miss Mae Ella Hunt at San Francisco March 23, 1913. To them was born in the city of Washington on March 3, 1914, a daughter, Corlis Theresa. They were a congenial couple. Mr. and Mrs. Nolan's married life was ideal and was a model of felicity and love. She was intimately associated with him in all his work. She was a helpmate, indeed; and it was a fitting tribute to our departed colleague and to Mrs. Nolan that without any solicitation on her part—in fact, against her earnest protest—his constituents insisted on electing her to fill his unexpired term in the Sixty-seventh Congress and also to the Sixty-eighth Congress, believing her to be the best equipped of any person in the district to carry on his work. Her sister, Mrs. Theresa Glynn, was secretary of the Committee on Labor and thus associated with Mr. Nolan in his work in Congress. She will be her sister's secretary and assist her in her congressional work.

The Members of the House of Representatives know Mrs. Nolan. They are her friends; they know her worth and ability and how intimately she was connected with her husband's work. As a tribute to her as well as a tribute to him who has gone she has been elected a member of the Committee on Labor so that she may be in a position to carry on his work for labor and for mankind.

JOHN I. Nolan was one of the most courageous and kindlest of men. Always ready to fight for the right as he say the right, always ready to help those who needed help, and always ready and willing to do a kindness, he was tireless in doing good. He spent himself and sacrificed his life for others, and when he passed the shores of the dark river of death he was undoubtedly welcomed on the eternal shore of peace and bliss with the greeting—

Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

For his bereaved widow and family and his orphaned daughter the Members of the House of Representatives offer their sympathy and unite with them in their sorrow.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON PATENTS, February 24, 1923.

Hon, CHARLES F. CURRY,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN CURRY: I regret exceedingly that I can not be with you Sunday in the memorial exercises for the late John I. Nolan.

JOHN I. NOLAN'S rugged character, his love of fair play, his refusal to count the cost in any contest against wrong or intrenched dishonesty, his high purpose, his unerring instinct for justice, his ability and intrepidity in fighting the good fight for the right won him the almost unanimous support of those he represented and the love of those of us privileged to know him intimately. He was of the people and, though he walked with the great, he never lost his touch with those from whom he came. Faithful to his trust he ever was; valiantly true to just folks and to himself. In the passing of John Nolan California has lost a commanding figure, a Congressman of rare fidelity and accomplishment; the Nation has lost one of its ablest and most patriotic sons; the people have lost an aggressive, fearless champion. John I. Nolan's name is written indelibly in the hearts of the men and women and children who needed aid and hope, and who never failed to obtain it from With you, I pay the last sad loving tribute to him. Sincerely.

HIRAM W. JOHNSON.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, February 25, 1923.

Hon. CHARLES F. CURRY,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CURRY: In the death of John I. Nolan California loses an honored and beloved citizen and the fifth district a splendid Representative. His life was a life of duty done, and he deserved the confidence reposed in him by the thouand he deserved the contact of the c the true friend and intrepld champion of human labor and strove to aid its cause. TRIBUTE TO JOHN I, NOLAN BY SAMUEL GOMPERS, PRESIDENT OF THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR.

No tribute in words at this time can constitute too full a recognition of the services so freely and ably rendered in the cause of humanity by John I. Nolan.

During his entire active life he was a consistent champion of every constructive effort which had for its purpose the improvement of life and labor for the masses of all people.

His untimely passing from the sphere of human activity came during his tenth year of service in the United States House of Those whom he had so long represented had Representatives. just returned him to his seat with a magnificent vote of con-

What his friends and associates in the trade-union movement find most difficult to realize is, however, not his loss from the Halls of the National Legislature but his departure from the ranks of the trade-union movement itself. Until his death he was a member of the executive board of the International Molders' Union of North America. This office with him was not one of mere honorary recognition, but it was one to which he gave the most active attention until the very end.

He participated in the affairs of labor as faithfully, as actively, and as earnestly as though he still worked at his trade. He was a conscientious and thoroughgoing trade-unionist

His service in behalf of underpaid employees of the Government will long be remembered by them. In furtherance of their just cause he made a pioneer and effective effort.

His patriotic services to the country in its hour of supreme need will long be remembered, and these alone would commend his memory to all who revere human devotion to high prin-ciples. He was in every respect high minded and fearless. He was loyal to his principles and to his friends; to his opponents he was fair, but unyielding in principle. He brought his splendid, manly characteristics into every activity and into every sphere of life into which he was led by his wide and humane impulses and interests.

For my own part I can not fail to express a keen personal feeling of great loss. John Nolan was my warm friend and in so many projects my colleague and collaborator.

All trade-unionists who knew John Nolan, and particularly those who were intimately associated with his life and work in the cause of labor, justice, freedom, and humanity and in public life will remember him as a type of trade-unionist of whom our movement is proud and in whose service and achievement it rejoices. His life was a life of service and devotion. His ideals deserve emulation.

His loss is irreparable but his life's work constitutes a memorial of magnificence and permanency. The trade-union movement, in sorrow, gives tribute to his memory.

SAMUEL GOMPERS.

William N. Doak, vice president of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, a close personal friend of Mr. Nolan, has handed me the following, which I will insert in the RECORD:

"My close association and intimate personal friendship with Hon. JOHN I. NOLAN has indelibly impressed me as to his sterling worth to his country and in particular his devotion to the interests of the great masses of our people. He was fair, honest, and reasonable, yet extremely manly and courageous in his convictions. He had his country's interests above all others and could not be swayed nor changed in his course as a representative of the people. The American labor movement, of which he was a lifelong member, has lost not only a consistent member but a tower of strength for good in its cause. He never was a radical but believed in conservative and orderly means to accomplish his aims and almost invariably won by such methods. His passing means the loss to his country of a patriot, to his family of a model husband and father, to the labor movement an ardent supporter of the rights of the masses, and to his associates, both in public and private life, a loyal friend and companion. We all loved, honored, and respected him and greatly mourn his loss."

Mr. CURRY. I have also received a tribute to Mr. Nolan from Mr. Cooper of Ohio, who was unexpectedly called out of town yesterday. I ask that it also be included in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, when I came to Washington in 1915 as a Member of the Sixty-fourth Congress one of the first Members of the House of Representatives with whom I became acquainted was our departed friend, John I. NOLAN, whose life and service we commemorate here to-day. There have been few men that I have known in my life for whom I have had greater respect than JOHN I. NOLAN. At all times I found him an honest, trustworthy friend who was ready to make any sacrifice to help others. He came from the common people. From his early boyhood days until he came to Congress he earned his living by the sweat of his brow. Early in his young manhood he became affiliated with organized laber, first as a private in the ranks and then working his way up until he attained the high position of an officer in one of the great international labor unions of our country.

JOHN I. NOLAN'S loyalty to the workingmen and women of his country is best expressed by his untiring efforts in their behalf during his service in Congress. In this connection I would like to add a word to what has already been said by thousands who mourn his passing. I know that the laboring men and women of the United States never had a stauncher friend than Congressman NoLAN.

Speaking for myself, I want to say that I consider the death of JOHN I. NoLAN as a great personal loss. For he was my true and loyal friend and on many occasions he assisted me in such a manner as to make my pathway more pleasant and easier to travel. His life, his sterling honesty and integrity, his love for his fellow man, have been inspirations to me.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to have inserted as part of my remarks, in 8-point type, an article on the life and service of John I. Nolan, by Thomas F. Flaherty, which appears in the Union Postal Clerk of December, 1922.

CONGRESSMAN NOLAN, OF CALIFORNIA, PASSES ON-DEATH ENDS BRIL-LIANT CAREER OF LABOR LEADER.

[By Thos. F. Flaherty.]

Congressman John I. Nolan, of California, beloved throughout the country because of his vigorous advocacy of legislation beneficial to the workers, died in San Francisco on November 18. While we mourn the life of a friend, we may find comfort in the fact that of such men as JOHN I. NOLAN little is taken away by death. Their spirit and character live after them and in the contemplation of their lives we feel the force and truth of Webster's words:

How little there is of the great and good that can die. They live in all that perpetuates the remembrance of men on earth; in all the recorded proofs of their actions; in the offsprings of their intellects; and in the respect and homage of mankind. They live in their example; and they live and will live in the influence which their lives and their efforts, their principles, and their opinions exercise and will continue to exercise on the affairs of men.

Congressman Nolan was widely known as the spokesman for organized labor in the House. He endeared himself particularly to Government employees by his fearless exposure of deficiencies in Government wage standards and his fight for the needed remedy, an adequate minimum wage.

The life history of John Nolan reads like an Horatio Alger story. At the age of 9 he was a cash boy in a San Francisco department store. At 20 he was an iron molder and already showing his mettle in the affairs of his local and international union. It was in the labor movement that John Nolan developed his great talents. His ability was recognized first by his immediate associates, who chose him as their business agent. This work brought him in contact with other unionists and he was later elected secretary of the San Francisco Labor Council. His first political position came to him as an appointment from Mayor McCarthy, another laborite, to membership on the board of supervisors in San Francisco.

With a background of years of activity in labor and municipal affairs in his home city John Nolan came into national political life in March, 1913, as a Member of the Sixty-third Congress, elected as a Progressive. He was reelected to each succeeding Congress since then. The universally high esteem in which he was held by his constituency is evidenced by his unanimous reelection as the nominee of both political parties in the recent election.

The same high purpose and unimpeachable character—a character resting upon a foundation laid deep in human love—which carried John Nolan upward in the labor movement brought him still wider recognition in the larger forum of the National Congress. With the passing of the Progressive Party as a political unit Congressman Nolan aligned himself with the Republicans. But he was never a narrow political partisan; he was partisan only to principles.

In the House he sought and secured membership on the Labor Committee, knowing that it offered him the best opportunity to carry out his purpose to advocate legislation bettering the working conditions of the wage earners. In the Sixty-seventh Congress he reached his goal, the chalrmanship of the Labor Committee. There also came to him the honor of a place on the select steering committee of the House, the committee that maps out the legislative program of the party in power.

But no political honors, no matter how high they might be, could induce him to sever his direct contact with the labor movement. He retained until his death his membership on the executive board of the International Molders' Union and attended regularly its meetings.

The foregoing outline of this remarkable man's life history tells inadequately the real story. How cold are words. I would like to speak of John Nolan as my friend. The past nine years I have known him intimately. I have watched closely this big and brave and generous and wholesome man as he met the storms of life. He never flinched from any task. His intimates loved him for his humanness.

His first reaction to the manner in which the Government transacted its routine business was typical of John Nolan and shows his outstanding attribute—a passion for justice and fair play. While other new Members of the Sixty-third Congress marveled at the beauty and size of the magnificent public buildings, all evidencing the Nation's wealth and security and greatness, the California laborite began studying the working conditions surrounding the humble tollers who were retained to care for the buildings and to work in them at the multiferous tasks incidental to the conduct of governmental affairs. From the facts developed by this investigation came his intense interest in the question of Government pay standards.

In the eyes of many these inconspicuous Government workers were as inanimate and as impersonal as the furniture or equipment. To John Nolan they were human beings, with the same ideals and aspirations as other normal humans. "Not in its parks or buildings or statues will our Nation find greatness, but in its men and women," was his retort to the banter of associates who, lacking his vision and sympathy, could see no necessity for concern at the old practice of governmental exploitation of helpless workers.

While many of his associates in Congress would frequently wax eloquent in their support of measures for the relief of peoples in remote corners of the world, Congressman Nolan's pointed suggestion that the United States first assume a more sympathetic mandate over its own employees met with no wild acclaim. There was no romance or glamour in the job of fixing adequate wage standards for charwomen or elevator operators. But John Nolan was not disturbed by the fact that he had to start single handed the fight for higher Government pay standards. He introduced his bill; he conducted hearings. For the first time in the history of our Nation a committee of Congress listened sympathetically to the sordid details of the lives of the submerged Government workers. Congressman Nolan succeeded in his objective—he directed public attention sharply to a condition that needed remedying.

The printed hearings on the Nolan minimum wage bill have been called "The Book of Heart Throbs." Quite appropriately it has been said:

We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths; In feelings, not in figures on a dial. We should count time by heart throbs. He most lives Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.

Congressman Nolan was largely instrumental in the formation of the organization of Government employees that has evolved into the National Federation of Federal Employees. In his district in San Francisco the first unit of the organization was formed. Repeatedly I have heard him tell audiences of Government employees, "You can help yourselves through intelligent organized effort more than I or any other Member of Congress can help you. You must collectively advertise the existence of a human element in the Government service. Only in this way can you arouse and keep informed a sympathetic public opinion, which is your safeguard against oppression or worse—industrial oblivion."

The Nolan $3 minimum wage bill passed the House three times only to be defeated in the Senate by a small group of reactionaries. But its underlying principle—the fixing of $1,080 as a minimum wage for Government employees—has been accepted and is embodied in the pending reclassification bill, which appears assured of early passage by the present Congress.

As spokesman for the labor group in the House Congressman Nolan's influence was a great force in shaping remedial legislation. Dozens of his fellow legislators, regardless of party affiliation, followed his lead without question. His steadiness, his integrity, and his wide knowledge of industrial subjects brought him into a sort of unofficial leadership of the progressive forces in Congress. One Congressman, a Democrat from the South, recently said to me, "My name is after John Nolan's on the House roll call. I always vote as he does on labor measures, knowing I can not go wrong in following his judgment."

Occupying a conspicuous place on the wall in his office in the House Office Building is a framed envelope bearing the address, "Hon. John I. Nolan, somewhere in the good old U. S. A." Congressman Nolan was in Arizona when the letter was delivered directly to him. It was sent by the late Daniel C. Slattery, a member of Local No. 2, N. F. P. O. C. The Congressman always pointed to it as evidence of the efficiency of a postal system that could deliver a letter so indefinitely addressed. He did not realize that his name was nationally known because of his sturdy insistence that the rights of the humble and lowly be recognized. He was not conscious that his faithful service and inspiring deeds were exerting a good influence throughout the land.

It is hard to write of John Nolan's life. There is so much to tell, and yet in the telling so much is lost. He was a delightful companion. How he hated hypocrisy. As an antidote to the boasting of a social climber or a descendant of a "first family," he loved to tell in company of his experiences as a young molder, out of employment and riding the "rods" or foraging for food.

In his family circle he was ideally happy. A loving wife and idolized young daughter were always his first concern. One of the proudest moments of his life was the occasion when the Queen of Belgium, from her place in the House gallery, saw little Miss Nolan seated with her father and requested that the child be brought to her. The queen complimented Miss Nolan, a beautiful golden-haired child with much of her daddy's winning personality, for having "brought the sunshine from California."

JOHN NOLAN has gone to a rich reward. He acted well his part in this life. The world is better for his example. His high character and great record of deeds well done have assured him an enduring place in the memory of men and eternal happiness in the beyond. Whatever a supreme being holds for the good he is now enjoying.

Thou sleepest not, for now thy love hath wings
To soar where hence thy hope could hardly fly.
And often, from that other world, on this
Some gleams from great souls gone before may shine,
To shed on struggling hearts a clearer bliss,
And clothe the right with luster more divine.

Mr. CURRY. Also, our colleague from California [Mr. Kahn], who has been ill but who is getting better, as the membership of the House will be glad to hear, has prepared an address, and I ask that his tribute be inserted in the Record.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, never could the encomium "Well done, good and faithful servant," be more fittingly applied to the life work of any man than to our friend and colleague, JOHN I. NOLAN, to whose memory we pay our tribute to-day. In his death the people of the fifth congressional district of the State of California have lost an industrious, faithful, able Representative, and the country a man who gave freely of the best in him to whatever furthered the interests and welfare of the Nation.

For more than a decade, which embraced one of the most important epochs in our history, he held his place in this House. Almost instinctively he discerned the right or the wrong of any question, rarely his judgment at fault, and on his path as legislator ever shone the guiding star of rectitude. Our friend had barely passed the meridian of life when the angel beckoned. At the very pinnacle of an abundant manhood he was stricken down. Yet death did not come to him until after a life replete with achievement.

From childhood, through all the years of adolescence and man's full estate, he faced the stern demands of toiling for his daily bread. When but 9 years of age he found employment as a cash boy in a San Francisco department store. By the time he reached 20 he was an iron molder and active in the affairs of local and international unions. He became not only an apostle but a protagonist of labor.

Men soon recognized his preeminent ability, his strength of purpose, his stern honesty of intention and action, his undeviating efforts to attain the end he aimed at. Where he led they were eager to follow. Withal he not only commanded respect, but won the affection of all who were brought into close contact with him. In 1912 he was chosen secretary of the San Francisco Labor Council. For 14 years he was an officer of the International Molders' Union of North America. The only political office he held prior to his advent here was as a member of the board of supervisors in San Francisco.

Mr. Speaker, the election of Mr. Nolan to the Congress of the United States was the logical outgrowth of his association with and leadership among the sturdy workers who surrounded him day after day. They had learned to appreciate the clear thinking that showed in his daily conversation. They recognized the straightforwardness of his course in all the relations of life. It needed no effort on his part to inspire them with confidence in him. That grew spontaneously. They trusted him. They felt that their interests could not be confided to safer hands than his. And out of this trust grew love and devotion. How fully John I. Nolan deserved this trust and affection his whole career in this body bears witness.

The first mandate as a Representative in Congress came to him from the Progressive Republican constituency of his district. For his second term he carried the standards of the Progressive Republican and Democratic parties. From his third term on to the end he is ranged with the Republican Party, but the remarkable fact is to be noted that in several of the successive elections he was the nominee of the Democrats as well as the Republicans of his district. In this we may again dis-cern the most convincing proof of the confidence with which men regarded him irrespective of political affiliations. They must have felt that no matter how intricate the problems might be that would present themselves to John Nolan, his native good sense would discover the truth and his honesty would not permit him to take any but the straight path.

A brief diversion into the realm of moral and political speculation, Mr. Speaker, springs from the recital of the facts just narrated. Ours is a government by parties; and under divine dispensation the Nation has grown and prospered, no matter what party was at the helm for the time being. The old ship of state has weathered many a severe storm while at the helm stood Federalist or Whig, Democrat or Republican. In our cities, in our States, in congressional as well as in national elections, we have seen at various times the wiping out of party lines and the amalgamation of political bodies of opposing tendencies. In these occasional upheavals, Mr. Speaker, may we not discover the fundamental good sense of the American electorate, the discernment which enables it to cast aside a man for a prin-Is it not a sign of sound political morality that, as in JOHN NOLAN'S case, Democrats placed in nomination a Republican whom they knew they could trust rather than one of their own party of whom they could not be sure? To my thinking, Mr. Speaker, this is a shining illustration of the native honesty of the American citizen and of his shrewdness in deciding when it is "better be sure than be sorry

No more splendid tribute could have been paid to John I. Nolan than these repeated expressions of the confidence and trust reposed in him by his fellows; no greater testimonial of their affections could he have desired. They knew that, having been true to himself, he "could not then be false to any man." He had passed through the acid test of daily intercourse in the same field of labor under like conditions for all; not only figuratively but actually, physically, he and they together had passed through flery furnaces. In those furnaces John Nolan molded the metal of his character and cast it into form. Need we wonder that men who stood side by side with him and saw this form expand under the hammer blows of life's turmoil felt secure in selecting and electing him to represent them in the Congress of the Nation?

From the very moment of his entering upon his activities in this House to the last day John Nolan ran true to form. was a foregone conclusion that he would be assigned to the Committee on Labor, and there he did splendid, effective work. Of this some of his colleagues on that committee will speak more in detail. I will content myself with a general review of his efficient labors.

From the very first he evinced great interest in the men and women of the lower grades of Government service. It is related that his attention and sympathy were first directed to the cleaners in the corridors of the House Office Building. may or may not be true, but it would be so characteristic of JOHN I. NOLAN that I am more than ready to believe it. At any rate he bent his efforts toward an increase in the pay of these most poorly paid of Uncle Sam's army of workers. It was but natural that his experience in the labor unions should lead him to favor similar organizations among Government employees. His desire to better their economic condition first found an outlet in his congressional district. There he advised the formation of associations of Government employees and there the movement was initiated which has resulted in the organization of the National Federation of Federal Employees. Throughout the length of his service in Congress he never failed to aid in every possible way. Several times he framed and introduced minimum-wage bills. Three times such a bill passed the House of Representatives, only to be defeated in the Senate. The basic principle of these bills, however, the fixing of $1,080 as a minimum wage for Government employees has found a footing in the reclassification bill now pending and successful action on which is no longer in doubt.

When this measure shall have been placed on the statute books the name of John I. Nolan will be imperishably associated with it, for he may be said to have been its progenitor. Certainly he gave the first impulse to the movement of which the law will be the culmination.

In many other directions did he show his solicitude for the welfare of those who labor with their hands. He proposed an amendment to the Constitution relative to the employment of children under 18 years of age. He introduced bills to restrict convict labor in competition with free labor in interstate commerce; to prepare systems of public works for future cyclical periods of depression and unemployment; to encourage ownership and to stimulate the buying and building of homes, and other measures of like far-reaching social and economic importance, enactment of which into law will come as surely as men's minds come to realize that the principles underlying these propositions are the very foundation stones of social order and prosperity.

His speeches on these and related subjects were frequent and always commanded attention, for all that knew him knew also that his utterances were not the mouthings of a demagogue currying class favor or votes but the outpourings of a spirit striving for betterment. His pleas were for the workers on farms and in forests and fields, for the workers in factories and shops and stores, for the toilers of the sea, and for those who in Government offices delved in scientific investigations for inadequate pay. He was an earnest speaker, and his arguments were driven home by logical deductions from incontrovertible facts.

When we turn to his personality we behold one whom to know was to esteem and to love. Firm in his convictions, he was ever gentle in his intercourse with his colleagues. litical differences did not lessen personal affection. I doubt if there was anyone on either side of this House but had a kindly feeling for John I. Nolan. He was the best of good fellows; always compassionate, kind-hearted, open-handed, generous, and considerate in thought and speech-loving and beloved.

Think not the good.
The gentle deeds of mercy thou hast done,
Shall die forgotten all. The poor, the pris'ner,
The fatherless, the friendless, and the widow,
Who daily own the bounty of the hand,
Shall cry to heaven and bring a blessing on thee.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, our fellow men judge us by other standards than our own. The personality, ability, and character we present to them are poured into the crucible for analysis and the result is the estimate by our fellows. We may differ, some-times radically, in estimates of a man, for every individual judgment is governed by its own standards, but I do not believe material difference will be found among the friends and colleagues of John I. Nolan when his record, ability, and accomplishments are submitted to the test.

We all knew him as few men become known here, respected him for his independence, fairness, and strength of character, and valued his advice and judgment. We knew his life struggle, his hard climb up the ladder, until he reached an honorable place in public life that any man, however gifted or great, might well be proud to fill. A splendid Representative in all that the term implies, charged with equal share of responsibility for legislation affecting the whole country, he never faltered or halted, but often led the way. individual triumph over circumstances will be found among all the membership of the House than the career of John I. NOLAN, and no higher tribute can be offered than this simple statement of fact.

What better preparation for the special legislation to which his energies were directed? Was it a question affecting human oppression or the rights of men expressed in constant appeal made in the name of humanity, John Nolan's heart was touched and he enlisted others in the cause until corrective legislation was had, if to be reached by law.

When problems were presented where party policies or expediencies were urged contrary to his judgment of right, he never hesitated what course to pursue, and in that independence lay his strength, for he never asked or permitted others to do his thinking. As he thought so he acted with all his might, and few men brought equal force or energy to a cause when once he was enlisted.

I knew John Nolan as many others knew him, and to me he afforded a striking example of simple courage, of high ideals, and a broad love of humanity. Hunt's story of Ben Adhem's vision might well apply to him, for John Nolan's highest ambition was to serve his fellow man, and we may well believe the recording angel has written his name high above the rest.

The great work which he begun, and which has been left to others to continue, must go on, but his strong leadership, great faith and energy, will be missed when most needed.

Life and death are impossible for finite minds to fathom. can only believe the Infinite has planned all things well, and that the compensation for John Nolan's loss lies in remembrance of the good he did and knowledge that the world was made better through his life. With those who grieve, I feel a deep sorrow and personal loss that can not be expressed in words.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, when a few weeks ago Congressman John I. Nolan passed to the far beyond this country lost one who typified American opportunity in the full sense of the word. No one can charge him with being a hypocrite. He was sincerity personified. He worked his own way up to the point where he won the respect of every one of his colleagues, because of his indomitable courage and love for work. emplified the American citizen who tried to do the best that was in him for his fellow men. He died poor in the sense that he left practically no financial resources. He died rich, however, in the esteem which his fellow citizens and his col-leagues held him. The people of his congressional district loved him. They paid him the greatest tribute that could be paid to man when they sent to Congress as his successor his dear and beloved wife. If John Nolan were able to speak to his fellow Americans to-day, he would have expressed himself in the language of a distinguished preacher, who said:

"He who wants to help shape the life and thought of coming generations must become the teacher of those that are young, expecting that these little ones will become the channels through which his own personality will journey forward, Bacon said that a book was a ship that carried the intellectual treasures of one century down to another. And the child is a kind of ship that floats the argosies of character forward, bearing them to the generations yet unborn. To what extent, then, do we love children? Are we teaching them? Are we in-terested in the schools either for the intellect or the conscience on the weekday or on Sunday? And upon how many children and youth are we impressing ourselves, and how deeply?
"'Shall I be remembered?' asked the wounded and dying

career puts that question to his own soul. It is a pathetic fact that nearly all of the things that men achieve perish with them and can not be left to society. Solomon may be the wisest of men, but, reading many languages, his child must begin just where his father began and learn the alphabet for himself. Some Burke as statesman may acquire such knowledge of human nature that he can read the flitting emotions that pass over an enemy's face as he would read an open book, but the great orator could not bequeath his knowledge of men to his The growing boy looked upon men's faces and tried to interpret their moods, at first as helpless as the savage who looks at the hieroglyphics on the page of a book and wonders what they mean. The outer masks that belong to the bodyclothes, furniture, gold-a man can leave, but the real treasure of his soul dies with him.

"There is one thing, however, that he may bequeath to his children. If the parent will take the time for it; if he will deny himself his ease and intelligence, and perhaps some of his culture, if walking abroad or reading, or sitting down or rising up, he makes a companion of his child, harvests for him all the wisdom of his long experience, teaches him self-control, and finally reproduces himself in the child, to that extent he can influence futurity. Children are wax to receive and steel to hold the writings of teachers. That is why all strong men feel so great a debt and obligation toward their parents and early teachers. Many a man here cherishes the features and name of some instructor, who did for him all that Arnold or Rugby did for Stanley. There are some of you who never think of that professor with whom you once studied, save with tears and tender thoughts. It is this that explains the hold your mother and father have upon you. In your middle life the era of science came in and skeptics and doubters and philosophers pulled down the philosophical structure that you built in your youth. It seemed as if the flood had come and swept all the But there was one thing that held youold structures away. your father's beautiful life, while your mother's face was to you the face of an angel, that from time to time shone forth with unexampled loveliness. Other influences come in to wreck boys and ruin them, but at last, either here or there, the influence and teachings of mother and father reassert themselves and draw the wanderer back to integrity and virtue. That which all other influences together can not achieve it is given to the teacher and parent to accomplish. Here we take short looks, like mariners who sail from cloud bank to cloud bank, instead of steering by the stars, but in the long look and the long run, when the child is old, and time, either here or there, has passed, the youth will not depart from the path made beautiful to him in childhood.

Compulsory study kill spontaneity! Look at this "What! calla lily! Why, the very freshness, beauty, and perfection of this flower stands for a rigid rule. By strict adherence to a set formula nature prepares the flavor of the strawberry. By rigorous rule nature paints the apple blossom; never varying her formula, she lends spice and tang to peach and pear. In the intellectual realm, also, in proportion as men have put themselves under rule and rigid compulsion, have they gone toward spontaneity of genius. Burns is a lyric poet, but David is the child of creative inspiration. 'Morning and noon and night do I pray.' For system feeds the springs of inspiration. Those orators, too, who have been most famous for spontaneous and extemporaneous eloquence in maturity-Webster and Gladstone and Beecher-have been given many years in youth to drill and compulsory training in voice and posture and Mr. Beecher tells us that for four years, in Amherst College, he was under the care of one of the great teachers in elocution, Professor Lovell, and that during the mild weather he spent two hours a day splitting the air with the explosion of vowels and consonants, and that he kept up his breathings and drill until he was 30, at which time his method was fixed.

"No youth is fitted to inherit an institution whose forehead is not on a level with the inventor thereof. To create wealth, social and material, requires great intelligence and wise ad-ministration. Watt's engine and Jacquard's loom incarnate their genius. No man can take charge of the loom whose intelligence is not equal to the automatic intelligence in the loom plus the brain power equal to all the crises of that loom. In like manner our social and political institutions incarnate the genius of an Adams, Washington, or Lincoln. No youth is fitted to lay hands upon this social mechanism who has not carried his brain and conscience up to the level of Hamilton and Jefferson when they invented their instruments. To give a throbbing engine into the hands of an inexpert child is a crime. Nor can it ever be right for the State to give its forceful tools to youth stupid and unwise through the State's neglect. Constitutions may make suffrage universal, but it is easier for the State to legislate aside the nature of things, or lead the Almighty to the edge of His universe and bow Him out of existence, than to give ignorance, weakness, and vice the right to go up to the judgment seat and through the ballot lever determine destiny for multitudes. In founding these institutions our fathers assumed that the people would see to it that there should never be a body of ignorant or untrained youth. But while much is being accomplished in moral training, it must be confessed that, relative to the advance in the creation of wealth, the development of intellectual tools, with press, public schools, and academies, the invention of instruments for moral training is far and away behind all others.

"The instruments for the moral training of youth are twofold. First are the common schools-jackscrews under the sills of the Nation by which all the people are slowly being lifted. Our fathers founded these schools not alone in the interest of wisdom and learning but of ethics and morality. Their schools exercised a triple function, to wit: Trained the child's reason to perceive the truth; his taste to admire the beautiful; his moral sense to judge between acts right and acts wrong. Casting out theology, they enthroned ethics. They taught the youth how to read and write and also how to carry himself in the home, the market place, the forum, and at the polls. Daniel Webster believed with them when he said: 'The right of the State to punish crime involves the State's duty to teach Ethics concern man as man. Moral principles are not denominational. They are no more ecclesiastical than the principles of breathing, or walking, or eating, or sound thinking. To render the youth's mind keen as a Damascus blade without teaching him how to carry his instrument through the crowded street is to work injury toward the child and disaster toward his fellows. The three R's are not so vital to the child's welfare as the moral principles that teach the art of right living. Disobedience to law is always slavery. Obedience is liberty. Disobedience is the law of fire, water, acid, is death. Obedience to the law of color gives the artist's skill; to the law of eloquence, the orator's power; to the law of iron, the inventor's engine. Disobedience to the moral laws means waste, wretchedness. Want turns cities into heaps and renders society a herd. Thus the common schools become the real promoters of civilization-the bulwarks thereof. They teach patriotism. They destroy clannishness. They unify the races. It has been said that 'The State rests upon a tripod-a free school, a free church, a free State. When one leg falls the whole structure will come crashing down."

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with a time-honored custom we are met to-day to pay the last tribute of respect to one of our colleagues who has joined "the innumerable caravan that moves toward the realms of death."

It is most appropriate that the House of Representatives should perpetuate this custom, for in this era public men are subjected to so much criticism and so much that is evil is attributed to their every act that it is eminently fitting for those who served by their side in public life to testify to the good they have done and to place a wreath of honorable memory upon the name of one who is not longer here to speak for himself.

JOHN I. NOLAN was a Member of this House for a very short time before the "grim reaper, Death," called him from the activities of this life to that "bourn from whence no traveler returns," but in the short time he was with us those who had the opportunity to meet and know him found a genial and kindly personality, united to a strong and forceful character, and had he lived but a few years more he would have undoubtedly left an impressive reputation as a legislator and statesman, for he had a wide grasp of all public questions and a clear discernment of the duties and obligations of his office such as few men show.

But it was not to be, and we are reminded again that in the midst of life we should be prepared for the summons that has been prepared for all of us and that may be served at any moment.

Fortunately, as we stand beside the bier of a loved one who has gone before we hear the gentle voice that reaches us through the centuries and bids us recall His promise in those words of never-failing cheer: "I am the resurrection and the life."

never-failing cheer: "I am the resurrection and the life."

It is this reflection that comforts us when we contemplate the many who have left us to go to that land of shadows and find through the valley of the shadow of death the way to the realms of everlasting peace.

It is then, as we recall the losses we have suffered in the past, that we may say with the poet:

Life's shores are shifting
Every year,
And we are seaward drifting
Every year,
Old places, changing, fret us;
The living more forget us;
There are fewer to regret us
Every year;
But the truer life grows nigher
Every year;
Earth's hold on us grows slighter
And the heavy burden lighter
And the dawn immortal brighter,
Every year.

The regard and esteem in which he was held by his associates in the Congress of the United States has been attested by others here to-day. John Nolan was a man of strong character and determination; when he took a position and made up his mind with reference to any question, he stood for it with that unfailing determination that marked him, in deed and in truth, as a man through and through, upon whom you could depend not only when the sun was shining but when the thunders rolled and darkness came. He stood like a beacon light for the principles he loved and which in his heart he believed were for the welfare of the people. He was ready and willing to listen to suggestions and to arguments, and if convinced that he was wrong he had the manhood and courage to acknowledge his error and correct his position.

Great as are the words and expressions that have been offered here to-day in tribute to the respect and memory of John Nolan, they must fade into insignificance when compared with the wonderful testimonial given to him by the people of his district when they selected his beloved widow as his successor in this legislative body.

There is no death here. The flowers which wither and die with the expiring year, as the cold blasts of winter come, merely sleep through the months of cold and fog and snow until the warm breath of May brings them back to life again. The rocks, as they decay, simply sustain the mosses that grow upon them. The sun, as it sets in the western sky, merely rises to shine in splendor on other seas and on other shores. The stars, as they move in brilliant procession across the skies during the night hours and disappear beyond the western horizon, simply rise again to shine in all their beauty upon other scenes. And so, upon occasions like this, there is always left to the friends of him who has departed the consolation and the faith that what we call on this earth death is merely the passing through the portal to a world we do not understand, but to a world which we are sure is more splendid, more magnificent than this, to a career which is longer than this, and there is left the hope that this life has been but a mere period of preparation for a newer and a fuller and a larger life which lies beyond the grave.

Therefore, in conclusion, let me say I desire to pay this tribute because of the fact I believe Congressman NoLAN deserves it by reason of the fact that he stood close at all times to the people and was in deed and in truth a true representative of those who intrusted him with their commission. He was a good citizen in life; he was a true friend; he was a faithful public official; he was a patriot, and a devoted husband and father; and therefore, in the end of his life, these characteristics all combine to make a consummation of a life which is an honor to him, which is a heritage to his loved ones and to his family, which is a gratification to his friends, which is a fond remembrance to the citizens of his great city and of the community in which he lived, and which being now made of record in the annals of this House will be in days to come a fitting memorial of a true American citizen, and when it is said of a man that he is a true American citizen it is saying of him that he represents the great principles for which this marvelous Republic stands, and no greater compliment or honor can be paid. May God bless and comfort his loved ones and help them to look forward to the coming of the perfect day when we shall meet those who have gone before and await us in the city beautiful.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE HENRY Z. OSBORNE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker and distinguished colleagues, at 3 o'clock and 5 minutes post meridian (Pacific time), February 8, 1923, in the beautiful city of Los Angeles, known in the days when the Spanish dons held sway over the broad domains of California as "La Ciudad de Nuestra Señora de Los Angeles," meaning, translated, the City of Our Lady of the Angels, there passed from the membership of the Parliament of this Great Republic to the Parliament of eternal life gathered around the throne everlasting one of God's mightiest noblemen, our beloved friend and colleague, Hon. HENRY ZENAS OSBORNE, of California.

There, surrounded by members of his family, including his children and grandchildren, amid the sunshine and flowers of the great city and State which he loved and had served so long and faithfully in such a distinguished manner, his life passed out with the ebb of the tide of the mighty Pacific, into whose shining waters sank the sun of the glorious western sea, as if in sorrow bowing in tribute to his memory.

His colleagues here know how he met the great ordeal. He who, on the field of battle, as a mere youth, had faced the murderous onslaught of shot and shell under circumstances that try men's souls-he who had fought life's battles and scaled the difficult ladder which, for him, led to achievement, fame, and distinction-did not falter in the hour which God in His wisdom had allotted that his soul should take its flight. We know in that supreme moment of transition he met life's greatest crisis as we who knew him and loved him expected that he would-unflinchingly, calm, and unafraid. His loss is universally mourned by all who knew him, and particularly so in this House, where his exceptionally fine qualities of mind and heart attracted men to him and caused them at once to discern his worth and to be proud to call themselves his friends. To me his friendship and association were particularly dear, not only because of my deep admiration for him personally as a man but because of his high intellectual qualities, broad experience, and well-balanced knowledge as a legislator.

Captain Osborne was more than a mere lawmaker; he was a statesman of the old school who grasped the problems of the hour and, with his keen perception and yardstick of unselfish, patriotic Americanism, read with unerring judgment their import to the present and future welfare of the Republic. Like the great Lincoln, of whom he was an intense admirer, he never swerved from his faith in our institutions and believed with his whole soul that our Government is, and should forever continue to be, of the people, by the people, and for the people; that it should be conducted for the greatest good to the greatest number and not for the few as against the many. His great heart throbbed with the spirit of democracy and equality—a tradition transmitted to him, no doubt, as a worthy descendant of a long line of American ancestry dating back to pre-Revolutionary Without bitterness or malice he was the upstanding days. protector of the weak and without ostentation carried into his daily life and contacts the teachings of the Master.

His life was one of unselfish service to community. State, and Nation, and last, but not least, to his God. He was soldier, citizen, and statesman, and his life and public services stand out in bold relief not only to be emulated by his own children, their children, and their descendants but by the youth of California and of the Nation.

I shall always treasure the memories of my close association with Captain Osborne here in Congress, for it was here that I grew to know and appreciate him best. To me, as a new man in the House, his ever helpful counsel and advice, which was always sincerely given when asked for but never ventured un-solicited, was of inestimable value. We worked in the closest cooperation; and while we separately represented two great congressional districts which are comprised within the confines of Los Angeles County, forming almost an empire, our relations were most harmonious and pleasant, and together we meshed without friction our efforts to serve the constituencies which had so highly honored us and which he reciprocated in such full measure.

These personal recollections I shall treasure within the innermost recesses of memory, enshrined about the image of one who has permitted me to drink a cup of kindness from his hands at life's most rare and beauteous fountain-the fountain of true friendship

To show the value which Congressman Osborne himself placed on friendship and the service to one's fellows inspired by it, I quote from a letter he wrote to all his friends, asking his son to let it reach them. This was written only a short time ago, when he realized his time was nearly up. It is indeed characteristic of our colleague as we knew him; his words were as follows:

Life is made happy only by friendships. My own life has been a treasury rich in friendships, and whatever I may be credited with accomplishing has been staunch friends, true friends, and their confidence and support have always been a comfort to me.

I have never counted as very important among life's ambitions the accumulation of worldly riches. Money is good only in its wise expenditure and for others. But I always felt that services for my fellows, so far as in my ability lay, brought me the greatest reward, and I have felt repaid that I devoted my life in public service.

Cicero, among the ancients, and Shakespeare, Moore, and Emerson, of later fame, understood and wrote of "the mysterious cement of the soul," of which fine texture Captain Os-BORNE wrote and paid tribute in his philosophy of life based upon his own life's experiences.

If I were to be asked in a few words to define our departed colleague's most outstanding virtues, the ones which towered high above all the rest-and he had many-I would say that they were loyalty, integrity, and friendliness.

He was loyal to a fault and never forgot the friends and principles which were near and dear to him before he achieved power, position, and influence.

His integrity was unquestioned, and he was the soul of honest purpose in thought and deed, in public as in private life.

His friendliness to all mankind in general and the friend-ship which he bestowed upon his friends was boundless, and clear and deep like the slient waters of the swift-flowing stream, carried on down life's pathway till the last. His words to me, on the bed where he lay, as I clasped his hand and left his presence for the last time, in November, 1922, were "Good-by, friend."

Among the many distinguished Members from all of the States of the Union gathered here to-day to pay public tribute to the life, character, and distinguished public services of our departed colleague are gentlemen who have perhaps known him longer, and who have the ability to express in words more fitting the universal sense of sorrow and of loss felt by the House on this occasion, but there are none who feel these emotions more deeply than I.

If there was any one thing for which Congressman OSBORNE was more noted in the way of a personal characteristic before the public than another, it was for his inherent modesty; it was intensely characteristic of the man. Shortly after the death last year of another distinguished colleague from California, Hon. John Arthur Elston, and perhaps realizing that one knoweth not the day nor the hour when the grim reaper cometh," and in keeping with his businesslike, methodical handling of his private as well as public affairs, he dictated in the third person to his faithful and efficient secretary, Mr. Chlide Nelms, a concise, impersonal, and authentic statement, characterized from beginning to end by its modesty, divorced from all egotism, a chronological sketch of his life and varied activities down to that time. Its concise and faultless diction, devoid of all blandishment and embodying in its entirety only the modest and simple statement of fact, all in the inimitable style of Congressman Osborne himself, speak the very spirit of the man whose memory to-day we honor, and bring him back to us as we knew him when he stood before us here on this very floor in full possession of all his manly force and vigor.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the biographical sketch which I shall read into the RECORD should form a permanent part of the proceedings of these memorial services, and that it should be preserved in the Congressional Record as a monument to our friend that future generations of Americans, long after we who are gathered here shall have passed from the scenes of life's activities, may read and ponder, and in so doing be inspired to emulate his example.

The sketch to which I refer is from the original dictation of Mr. Osborne with one or two very slight additions of fact inserted to bring his congressional career down to date. The sketch with the accompanying explanatory memorandum from his secretary, Mr. Nelms, is as follows:

[Memorandum for Mr. LINEBERGER.]

FEBRUARY 15, 1923.

This little sketch was dictated to me by Mr. Osborne in November, 1921, shortly before he departed for California when Mr. Elston's body was sent back there for burial. The copies made at that time were exhausted in supplying the various newspapers, and this has been reproduced from my shorthand notes. The only change made was where I mentioned the fact that Mr. Osborne was appointed a member of the Committee on Appropriations last spring, whereas at the time the sketch was dictated he was still on the Rivers and Harbors.

Although Mr. Osborne was opposed in the primary last August by another Republican candidate, he was nominated without opposition by the Democrats, and was written in by the Prohibitionists to the extent to nominate him and tied the Socialist candidate. He had no opposition whatever in the election. Mr. Osborne, as you know, left here in September last and never returned.

If there is any other information I can give you, I'll be only too glad to furnish it if you will only suggest.

CHLIDE NELMS.

"Henry Z. Osbobne, printer, editor, gold miner, and Congressman, born at New Lebanon, Columbia County, N. Y., October 4, 1848, eldest son of Rev. Zenas Ward Osborne and Juliette (Bristol) Osborne. At 13 years of age he was apprenticed to learn the printers' trade in the office of the Buffalo Christian Advocate. This was during the period of the Civil War, at the beginning of which he was but 12 years of age. He desired to volunteer into the military service as a drummer boy, but his parents would not permit him to do so. Late in 1864 his mother passed on, and in February, 1865, he enlisted as a private in Company E, One hundred and ninety-second New York Volunteer Infantry, responding to the last call for troops of President Lincoln. At that time it was presumed that the war might last a year or two longer. His regiment was dispatched to the Shenandoah Valley and became a part of the Third Provisional Division of Hancock's Veteran Corps, under the general command of Lieut, Gen. Phil Sheridan. Throughout his military service he was on duty at all times, excepting three weeks, which he spent in a field hospital at Summit Point, Va. He was mustered out of the military service at Cumberland, Md., August 28, 1865, but was held in service until October 2, 1865, when he was given his final discharge at the Troy Road Barracks, near Albany, N. Y., two days before his seventeenth birthday.

"Immediately thereafter he obtained employment as a printer in the office of the Utlca (N. Y.) Herald. In the following summer he worked in the office of the Titusville (Pa.) Herald, the Clincinnati Gazette, the Memphis Avalanche and Appeal, the Jackson (Miss.) Clarlon, and the New Orleans Daily Crescent, where he lived for more than 10 years. At 24 years of age he was president of the New Orleans Typographical Union—in the year 1873—and three years later, at 27, he was first vice president of the International Typographical Union. In the meantime he was New Orleans correspondent of the Chicago Tribune, from 1873 to 1878, and was a legislative reporter in New Orleans and for a time reporter of the Associated Press.

"In 1877 he had a severe attack of pneumonia at New Orleans and moved, in 1878, to California, where he became editor and publisher of the Bodie Daily Free Press, which he published for six years. In 1884 he published the Los Angeles Evening Express, and removed to that city of which he has been a citizen ever since. At that time there were about 15,000 people in Los Angeles. He edited and published the Evening Express until the year 1897. His life has been intimately connected with the growth of the city of Los Angeles, He participated in the organization of many of the civic, social, and commercial organizations of the city, was a charter member of the Chamber of Commerce in 1888, a member of the board of directors for several years, vice president in 1911, and president in 1912, was a charter member of the Chamber of Mines and Oil in 1907, charter member of the California Club, Union League Club, and Sunset Club, president of the latter club in 1905. He was vice president of the California Press Association in 1888; president of the Southern California Editorial Association in 1889; was senior vice commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic in 1912 and 1913; member of California Society, Sons of the Revolution; served six years as captain in the National Guard of California, retired in 1897; was worshipful master of Southern California Lodge 278, F. & A. M., in 1888, and eminent commander of Los Angeles Commandery No. 9, Knights Templar, in 1891; was a charter member of Al Malaikah Temple, Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, and one of the committee who selected its name; held many positions of trust and confidence as executor of estates, etc.; United States receiver of public moneys of Bodie, Calif., third district, six years-1878 to 1884-United States collector of customs for the Los Angeles district four years-1891 to 1894-United States marshal, district of Southern California, embracing the southern half of the State eight years-1898 to 1906was commissioner of the board of public works of Los Angeles, 1914 and 1915; took an active interest in politics and was a delegate to the Republican State conventions about 20 years, commencing with the convention of 1882, when Hon. Morris M. Estee was nominated for governor the first time; served 10 years as member of the executive committee Republican State central committee of California, five terms of two years each, from 1890 to 1900, in 1896 presiding over combined committees of southern California in the successful campaign for the election of President McKinley; was a delegate to the Republican national convention of 1888 which nominated Gen, Benjamin Harrison for President.

"At the age of 24, in 1872, he was married to Miss Helen Annas at Cazenovia, N. Y., and has four sons and one daughter. The sons of Sherrill B. Osborne, attorney; Henry Z. Osborne, jr., a civil engineer, and connected many years with the engineering department of the city of Los Angeles and later as chief engineer of the board of public utilities; Clarence B. Osborne, geologist and mining engineer, located at Denver, Colo.; and Raymond G. Osborne, testing engineer, with chemical and physical laboratories in the Marsh-Strong Building, Los Angeles. The only daughter, Edith Helen Osborne, married Samuel S. Stahl, highway engineer. All were attendants and graduates of Stanford University.

He was first elected to the Sixty-fifth Congress in 1916 as a Republican by 63,913 votes, a majority of 30,688 over his opponent. He entered Congress immediately before the commencement of the World War, and his first vote was cast for the declaration of the state of war, as advocated by President Wilson on the first day of the session of that Congress. His votes throughout the war were without exception in favor of its prosecution and in support of the administration which has been charged with responsibility, and without reference to partisan considerations. He voted for the selective draft bill, the various supply bills, including all the Liberty loan acts, for giving the Government all the power that it asked of Congress in order to successfully conduct the war. Near the end of his first term in Congress he received a letter from about a dozen or 15 of the leading Democrats of Los Angeles, stating that they had noted with satisfaction his speeches and votes in favor of standing by the administration in the prosecution of the war, and that they desired to attest their appreciation in some substantial way. He was asked that in the event that he should be made the regular candidate of the Democratic Party, without effort on his part and without obligation either political or otherwise, would be decline such nomination. that if there was a substantial feeling of that kind among the Democrats of his district he would not only not decline such a nomination but would regard it as a great honor.

"Accordingly the leading Democrats of the district circulated petitions required by law and he was without opposition made the candidate of the Democratic Party as well as of the Republican Party. His name was also written in on Prohibition ballots in such numbers that he became also the candidate of the Prohibition Party. This resulted in his receiving a vote in the election of 1918 of 72,773 to 9,725 for the Socialist nominee, a majority of 63,048, for the Sixty-sixth Congress.

"In 1920 he was again renominated by Republicans, Democrats, and Prohibitionists, and received 97,469 to 20,439, a majority of 77,030,"

In this connection I wish to insert that again last year he was renominated by the Republicans and indorsed by Democrats and Prohibitionists for the Sixty-eighth Congress and was elected almost unanimously, having received 98,739 votes.

"During the World War Congressman Osborne was very

"During the World War Congressman Osborne was very active in Congress in participating in the legislation for the carrying on of the war. In the Sixty-sixth and Sixty-seventh Congresses he was also prominently connected with the legislation to restore the country to a condition of peace by the reduction of taxes and the bringing down of the expenses of the Government to peace conditions. He was a member of one of the major committees of the House, that on Rivers and Harbors, and was ranking member of that committee when he resigned to accept appointment on the Committee on Appropriations in the spring of 1922. His work has been potential in bringing to Angeles and southern California many public utilities. During the war he assisted in the location of Camp Kearny, March Field, and the balloon school at Arcadia, known as Ross Field. He secured the final appropriations for constructing the silt-diversion plan of discharging the Los Angeles and San Gabriel Rivers into the ocean in such a way as to prevent the deposits of silt in Long Beach and Los Angeles Harbors. He secured an appropriation to connect Long Beach Harbor with the Los Angeles Harbor through a waterway, also an appropriation for the dredging of the West Basin and for widening and straightening the entrance to the harbor which will eventually increase the width to 1,000 feet. He also worked diligently for the establishment of the submarine site at Los Angeles Harbor. He secured for the city post office the terminal substation, which is now the principal workshop of the post office and which added immensely to the postal facilities of

"During the Sixty-seventh Congress he was the last soldier of the Civil War on the Union side to serve as a Member of Congress. There was also one Confederate. When he entered the Sixty-fifth Congress there were four Union soldiers and four Confederates.

"His interest in the conduct of the war extended to the soldiers engaged in the war, and he was always a consistent friends of the soldiers of the World War and of all soldiers and sailors who served the country in time of war. When the League of Nations controversy was before the country he advocated reservations to the covenant that would prevent the Nation from being involuntarily plunged into war and which would preserve the integrity of the Nation. He was a warm advocate of the Limitation of Arms Conference called by President Harding.

"He formed a very widespread acquaintance in both House and Senate and enjoyed a high degree of personal popularity, as well as with the President, members of the Cabinet, and ad-This acquaintanceministrative officers of the Government. ship enabled him to be of more than usual service to the citizens of the tenth congressional district."

And so it is, Mr. Speaker, that earth's last picture was painted in the sketch which I have just read by the hand of him who fashioned from humble beginnings the deeds which characterized his life of distinguished achievements, making it so worthy of emulation.

In this connection I recall that Captain Osborne was of a deeply literary and contemplative mind, and I am sure that he felt that the activities of this life were only to be the stimulus for growth and achievement in the one to come.

Knowing his fondness for the lines of Kipling embodied in that magnificent piece of verse, "When earth's last picture is painted," wherein the contemplative soul of Captain OSBORNE found such happy reflections, if I may be permitted, I shall quote it herewith as a tribute to his memory:

WHEN EARTH'S LAST PICTURE IS PAINTED.

When Earth's last picture is painted and the tubes are twisted and

When the oldest colours have faded, and the youngest critic has died, We shall rest, and, faith, we shall need it—lie down for an acon or Till the Master of all good workmen shall put us to work anew.

And those that were good shall be happy, they shall sit in a golden chair; shall splash at a 10-league canvas with brushes of comets' hair; They shall find real saints to draw from—Magdalene, Peter, and Paul; They shall work for an age at a sitting and never be tired at all!

And only the Master shall praise us, and only the Master shall blame; And no one shall work for money, and no one shall work for fame, But each for the joy of the working, and each, in his separate star, Shall draw the thing as he sees it for the good of things as they are!

In meter and in cadence similar to the poems of his favorite Longfellow, whose pure and primitive poetic style appealed to Congressman Osborne's untarnished soul, I have humbly attempted to compose and dedicate these parting words to our friend, who, when he was with us, squarely faced the east and fought life's battles. Having nobly completed his task, he silently folded his tent and turned to the west, where sinks the setting sun, only to be followed by the quiet and peaceful slumber of the night in preparation for the great awakening of the glorious resurrection morn on eternity's shining shore:

Farewell colleague, comrade, brother, friend,
When the Great Architect of the universe,
In conformity with life's eternal plan,
Shali have raised us to a higher and sublimer sphere
To complete the work begun but left unfinished here,
In that far-distant land to which you have traveled,
When we, too, have passed from labor to refreshment plane,
We feel, we know, that we shall meet again.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, when HENRY ZENAS OSBORNE died at his home in Los Angeles, Calif., on February 8, 1923, the House of Representatives for the first time in possibly more than 50 years found that its roster of membership did not include the name of a single man who had served in the Union Army during the Civil War. Captain OSBORNE was the last, as he was one of the most gallant, of that long list of Federal soldiers who were Members of this House, and he will probably be the last, except for Gen. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD, of Ohio, who returns, always welcome, with the advent of the Sixty-eighth Congress. May for many years to come remain with us Maj. CHARLES M. STEDMAN, of the Fifth North Carolina district, the sole survivor of the lost cause in either branch of Congress

Captain OSBORNE enlisted in the Civil War at the age of 16 private in Company E, One hundred and ninety-second New York Volunteer Infantry, and served until the close of the when he was honorably discharged. He had been apprenticed to the printers' trade, and in the late sixtles found himself in New Orleans, where he became president of the New Orleans Typographical Union, and also served as vice president of the International Typographical Union, and where he remained until 1878, as New Orleans correspondent for the Chicago Tribune, and, from 1873 to 1878, as a reporter and writer on New Orleans papers.

He is not to be confused with the parasites who came at that time to prey upon the broken South. He came to New Orleans as one who had fought against the Confederate forces but who, when the war was over, sympathized with the troubles of his late opponents in arms, sought to rebuild and reconstruct the part of the United States that he had fought to keep in the Union and to make its people happy and contented in that Union that he had helped to preserve. How different from that large post-bellum army, most of whom, stragglers and sutlers, had never smelt powder, who had come to trample and batten upon the conquered!

He left Louisiana for California five years after I was born, and it so happened that in 1917 he came to membership from the Los Angeles district in this body in which it had been my privilege to serve since 1910. He looked me up, having seen probably in the Congressional Directory that I was one of the Representatives from the city of New Orleans. He told me of his old associations in that historic city, of the delightful recollections that he had of the years he spent there, of his sympathy for the people of the South and for Louisiana in those horrid times, and of his never-forgotten interest in the Crescent City and his desire always to be of service to it and to the State of Louisiana. He made good that assurance. He was assigned to membership on the Rivers and Harbors Committee, of which I was then and am now a member, and he never failed, in any preparation in committee of the rivers and harbors bill and on the floor of the House, to give his ald to the waterways of my State.

It was at a time when rivers and harbors legislation had fallen under the ban of newspaper criticism, when some old jibe, taken from Jo Miller's Almanac, went a long way in committee and on the floor in deciding whether a project was worthy of improvement. Because, faithful to history and tradition, we call large streams in Louisiana "bayous," because some of them have names strange to the ears of would-be jokesmiths-Tchefuncta, Bogue Falaya, Atchafalaya, Barataria—it was easy to get into the RECORD with supposedly witty quips and wanton wiles about these waters. Captain Osborne, who evidently in his stay in Louisiana, had not strictly confined himself to the Typographical Union, but had learned much of the wonderful system of waterways in that State, which nature had given it and which the Government, lately recognizing its tremendous value and benefit, is now seeking to develop, would put a stop in committee and on the floor to these "merry jests," and would tell what he knew of this stream or that, how important it was, and how susceptible of development and benefit to the adjacent community. That generous service neither I nor the people from Louisiana and New Orleans can forget.

Captain Osborne made it a point at least once a session to take the southern trip en route from his home in Los Angeles to Washington, so that he could linger for a few days in New Orleans. He would tell me after one of these visits how he looked over the old city, how much he found unchanged, and how much he found modern and up to date. He whispered to me once that during one of these "stop-overs" he had gone to call on the daughter of a young lady of the sixtles, with whom he was then boyishly in love. How good a man he was to remember the fleeting affection of early youth, after a lapse of half a century.

I think one of the most characteristic and beautiful things he did was when, learning in some way or other that my present secretary, William H. Fulham, of New Orleans, was a grandson of his old newspaper friend of the seventies, Thomas S. McGovern, for 50 years connected with the newspapers of New Orleans, and, at the time of his death, dean of the news-paper men on the old Times-Democrat, he called at my office to make the acquaintance and to shake the hand of his old comrade's grandson.

Mr. Speaker, I limit these remarks in memory of Capt. HENRY Z. OSBORNE to the time that he fought in the war between the States, to his pleasant recollections of the years that he spent in New Orleans, as printer, reporter, and journalist, and to the great service he rendered to Louisiana and New Orleans when many years after in Washington he showed that he was loyal to the place he had once called home. I would add only this: He was a good man and a true one, and I sorrow that he is dead.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Speaker, others will speak of the public life and service of Mr. Osborne. I shall speak more of his personal life and qualities. It is a privilege and honor to hold high public position and perform its duties with credit and distinction. However, I am sure that the greatest rewards of life are found in its homely relationships. The human mind is so constituted that it highly prizes the unusual thing or the one difficult of attainment, and fails to fully appreciate the ordinary blessings of life because they are common. In my mind I picture an ordinary American home, blessed with health and reasonable comforts. The father is at work earning the family living and preparing for its future; playing in the yard are bright-eyed, happy children bearing on their faces the images of mother and father; the mother goes cheerfully about her homely duties, with now and then snatches of old songs upon her lips. Surrounded by friends and blessed by wellearned good names, who can tell me what this world has to give that is a greater reward? In a man's friends, in his home, in his brother, sister, father and mother, child and grandchild, and in his good name he has the greatest reward of life.

I never knew Mr. Osborne until I met him in Congress six years ago. When the parting time came I respected, admired, and appreciated him to that degree of attachment we call

When I first knew Mr. Osborne he and his wife were living in the same hotel as I. The first thing that drew me to him beyond an ordinary friendship was the constant, kindly, attentive solicitude for his invalid wife. I then had the opportunity of close association with them for many months. I learned of relationship that was finely admirable to an unusual degree. looked upon Mr. OSBORNE and his good wife and saw the ripened fruit of an ideal love-old age beautiful.

Shortly before the failing health that finally led to his passing, Mr. Osborne wrote a little Christmas story that gives an insight into the character of his family life. This is what he wrote:

As I look back, the Christmas that is most distinct in my memory was not connected with the Civil War, but it immediately followed the close of the Civil War—Christmas, 1865.

I left the little seminary town of Cazenovia, N. Y., to do my soldiering, but went to work on the Utica Herald on my return. I was then 17 years old. I concluded to spend my holidays at Cazenovia, and I went to the home of dear old Mrs. Ives, with whom I used to board. It was evening, and I knocked at the door. I was surprised and delighted to have it opened by a young lady whom I thought the most beautiful I had ever seen. In those days there was neither gas nor electricity, and she had a kerosene lamp in her hand. I had never seen her before, and I commenced to explain who I was. I was very nervous and she must have been nervous, too, as between us we managed to shake off the chimney from the lamp and break it on the floor. I made a resolution that I would marry this beautiful girl, but that I must make $10,000 before I could think of starting life. As Jacob served seven years for Rachel, so I worked seven years to get my $10,000 together, without results. I gave up the financial limit that I had placed upon my hopes, and this lady did me the honor to become my wife.

We now have, grown up and heads of families themselves, four sons and one daughter and 10 grandchildren.

I think that was one of the most important events in my life, the Christmas when the lamp chimney broke.

The secretary of Mr. OSBORNE told me of the circumstances under which this story was written, shortly before Christmas, 1921. Mr. Osborne proceeded with his usual calmness and self-possession until he spoke the words: "And this lady did years and ten, and still we were very reluctant to see him go.

me the honor to become my wife." There his voice broke and a lengthy pause ensued. Then, dictating the two final sentences, he hastened to the train for California, on which, within 48 hours, he was in the grip of the malady that finally ended his earthly career.

The vivid bond of love that Mr. OSBORNE had for his wife he also shared with every member of his family. Interest and pride in his children and grandchildren was a buoyant force of his life. Practically every week of his sojourn at Washington he prepared a letter to be distributed to each member of his family. These letters constitute an interesting review of his observations of public life at Washington and give an unfailing index to his attitude in a wide field of personal activities and relations. All bear a marked portrayal of his appreciative character, his devotion and loyalty to his loved ones and his friends, of the wholesome things that brought happiness and concern to him, of his human sympathy and desire to contribute to the happiness of others and serve public welfare.

Mr. OSBORNE appreciated and loved nature. The clear sky, the flying clouds, the smooth, reflecting lake and the roaring, tumbling ocean, the green sward, the great stretches of the desert, the flower-strewn fields, and the rugged mountains alike brought joyous responses from his soul.

What is the compensation of a life? Not the extent and quality of rewards conferred, but rather the faculty and disposition to utilize and enjoy one's opportunities. In his disposition to observe, appreciate, love, and find happiness in nature, friends, every virtue, every noble quality, Henry Z. Osborne had a fullness of life's rewards far beyond the average man.

The quality of appreciation was perhaps the key to the real life of Mr. Osborne. Those without intimate contact with him recognized his pleasing personality, his sincerity, his rectitude, and his usefulness, but only those in intimate contact with him will fully appreciate or understand Mr. OSBORNE, the man.

That same quality of appreciation was applied to his human associations. As he was made glad by the beauty of flowers and fields and birds, so, too, in a greater degree did he find pleasure and happiness in the beauty of human conduct and character. If his friend showed courage, he applauded; if wisdom, he praised; if kindness, he responded; if sympathy, he concurred; if well-doing, he cooperated. In the recognition of every human virtue, in beauty of character, he found delight.

But I would not conclude without referring to the public service of Mr. Osborne. He had long been schooled by interest and participation in public affairs. He was free from petty prejudice and localized selfishness. His mental qualities were not hedged about. He had a vision that lifted him above those handicaps that detract from the usefulness of many men. He had that breadth of view, catholicity of thought, and innate sense of justice that made his mind an open forum for every problem of his country. The determination he reached was never the assertion of a prejudice, but the product of his heart and his brain.

These qualities enabled him to give an attentive ear and a considerate courageous judgment to every matter that came before him in committee or in this House. They made him a servant and representative of a Nation. He conceived this as great Republic, with many and varied conditions and problems, to all of which he devoted the best qualities of his mind and heart.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker, on such occasions as this we are reminded that there is an omnipotence that presides over the destinies of man and nature and that all must bow to His supreme law. He has ordained rules that we can not transcend, He has established boundaries that we can not pass. Everything on this earth must take its allotted course. The seasons have their allotted time, and we know that the warmth, the verdure, and the promise of spring must in due course be followed by the bleak and cold of winter. We recognize that the rising sun of every day, no matter what the splendor of its dawning, only foretells the coming of another night. The waters that babble so merrily in the brook to-day must to-morrow run on down and finally be consumed in the all-embracing sea. So with man. We, too, must bow to the same inevitable law, and after we have run our alloted course, the body must be returned to the earth from whence it came and the spirit to God who gave it. Yet knowing all this, we find ourselves ill prepared on occasions like this to meet the shock when the Grim Reaper has called a friend and companion from our midst, as he did when he beckoned our colleague to the great beyond.

We need his kindly friendship, his genial comradeship, and his mature and helpful judgment and advice. And if our kindly thoughts and good wishes could have stayed the hand of fate, he would have been spared to us for many years to come. He passed away after a lifetime of honored service to his community, to his State, and to his Nation. It was fitting that his last days should have been passed in the bosom of his family, amid the flowers and sunshine of southern California, which he loved so well, surrounded by a constituency which he had served with distinction and which had learned to love and respect him, as shown by the fact that they returned him to Congress time after time with ever-increasing majority, until at last the good people of his district made it unanimous with a vote nearly 100,000 strong. Such a triumph would seem the crowning climax to the life work of any man, leaving little more for which to aspire in this world. And it was then that God in His infinite wisdom spoke to Henry Zenas Osborne and said:

Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, in the passing of HENRY Z. OSBORNE the Sixty-seventh Congress has lost not only one of its most highly respected Members but the only veteran of the Civil War on the Union side who was a Member of this House. Congressman Osborne was the only representative in this body of those gallant men who from '61 to '65 offered their all upon the altars of their country. His death marks an epoch in the history of this Congress.

Captain Osborne was one of the true men of this House. An earnest advocate of any cause which he believed to be right, he fought fairly and in the open, and when the contest was ended he retained and enjoyed the friendship and admiration of those who differed with him.

He was a man of wide experience-soldier, journeyman printer, frontier newspaper man, owner and editor of a city daily, Federal official, and Congressman. He was one of the pioneers of California, where he went as a young man to Bodie, one of the famous old-time mining camps of the Golden State. He lived through the rough ploneer days of California and his kindly and genial nature remained unchanged.

Congressman Osborne's speech in this House describing a trip to the Orient was one of the most interesting addresses that I have heard here since I have been a Member of this body. It was a valuable contribution to the knowledge of Congress and the country upon that subject. His address on "Ulysses S. Grant as a Soldier," delivered at McKeesport, Pa., on April 27, 1922-the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of General Grant-was a masterly tribute to the great leader of the Union armies, one that can be read with interest and profit by any friend or admirer of the military genius of the Civil War. I am glad that it has been preserved to posterity in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Congressman Osborne was a lover of little children and seemed to be happy in their company. I have heard him conversing with little ones and through those conversations I have seen and observed traits of character that one could perhaps learn in no other way.

Captain Osborne was always interested in the development and upbuilding of his State and his home city. Long identified with the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, and at one time its president, he contributed much to the marvelous growth that his city and the State of California have enjoyed.

He was the ideal type of public official. Receiver of public money at Bodie, Calif., in the early mining days, collector of customs at Los Angeles, United States marshal for the southern district of California, he filled all of these positions with credit and honor to himself and with the approbation of the people.

Captain Osboane was first elected to Congress in 1916 and reelected in 1918, 1920, and 1922. The district which he represented contained a population considerably in excess of 500,000, or about twice as many as the ratio of representation prescribed by the present law. The very high esteem in which he was held by his constituents is shown by the large majorities with which he was honored, having received nearly 100,000 votes in the last election.

Congressman Osborne was a fine type of legislator. He was honest, industrious, and courageous. Steadfast in his own views, he recognized the right of anyone to differ with him. These characteristics together with his genial, pleasant nature won for him the love and respect of his colleagues. The Nation has lost an able and honorable legislator, his colleagues a true friend and companion, and his State and district a strong, conscientious, and earnest Representative. He will be missed both at home and at Washington.

Mr. FREE. Mr. Speaker, we are here to-day to honor the memory of our deceased colleague, Henry Z. Osborne, of California.

It was his privilege to live beyond the span of years usually allotted to mortal man, and during all of that long period of time by his pleasant ways, gracious manner, and thoughtful disposition he scattered along the pathway of life love and ten-derness and has left behind him memories of a life well spent.

derness and has left behind him memories of a life well spent. He was born in New Lebanon, Columbia County, N. Y., on October 4, 1848. At the age of 13 he was apprenticed to learn the printer's trade. At the age of 16, imbued with the necessity of preserving the Union indivisible, he enlisted as a private in Company E of the One hundred and ninety-second New York Volunteers and joined the Army of his country to fight during the Civil War.

After the war was over he followed his trade of a printer in New York, Cincinnati, Memphis, New Orleans, and Austin

New York, Cincinnati, Memphis, New Orleans, and Austin, Tex.

In 1873, at the age of 24, he was elected president of the New Orleans Typographical Union, and in 1876, while then only 27 years of age, was elected vice president of the International Typographical Union.

From 1873 to 1878 he was New Orleans correspondent for the Chicago Tribune, also reporter and writer for New Orleans papers, and during this period contributed much to the reconstruction of the South.

In 1878, at the age of 28, he moved to Bodie, Calif., which was then one of the liveliest mining camps of the West, and until 1884 was editor and publisher of the Bodie Daily

In 1884 he moved to Los Angeles, Calif., which then had a population of only 15,000 people, and there he lived until the time of his death.

From 1884 to 1897 he was editor and publisher of the Los Angeles Evening Express.

Many positions of honor were his to hold:

In 1912 he was president of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce; in 1889 he was president of the Southern Caltfornia Editorial Association; in 1888 he was vice president of the California Press Association; in the years 1912-13 he was senior vice commander of the Grand Army of the Republic. For six years he acted as captain of the National Guard, from which position he retired in 1897. From 1878 to 1884 he acted as receiver of public moneys at Bodie, Calif.; from 1891 to 1894 he was United States collector of customs at Los Angeles, Calif.; from 1898 to 1906 he performed the duties of United States marshal for the Los Angeles district. In 1914-15 he was commissioner on the board of public works for the city of Los Angeles. He was elected to the Sixtyfifth, Sixty-sixth, Sixty-seventh, and Sixty-eighth Congresses, but died before the sessions of the last were convened.

He has always been an active Mason, and at his death was a member of the blue lodge of Free and Accepted Masons, a Knight Templar, and a member of the Order of the Mystic

In 1872 Mr. OSBORNE married Miss Helen Annas, of New York State. This proved to be a most happy union, and was blessed with four sons and a daughter, all of whom are grown and survive him,

Mr. OSBORNE loved all of California, but as he had cast his lot in southern California it was his great pride to see it grow from a mere town to a thriving metropolis.

During his whole life he enjoyed the respect and esteem of all of those with whom he came in contact. He was gentle of manner and exceedingly kind, yet behind it all was a persua-siveness and forcefulness that spelled success.

Having met him you respected him; having known him you loved him. Always kindly, always just, always willing to help his fellow man, it certainly can be said of him that he scattered flowers along life's pathway and made the world better as he

His wife has lost a faithful husband, his children have lost a devoted father, his friends have lost a loyal friend, and California has lost an able, honored, and respected Representative.

Mr. LINEBERGER took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, to be elected by a constituency as its Representative in Congress is one of the greatest honors that can come to an American. But to represent a constituency term after term ably, acceptably, and well, forgetful of self-interest and with an eye single to the welfare of the public is achieved by few. Henry Zenos Osborne so represented the tenth California district, and his constituents honored themselves by so honoring him.

The life, achievements, and public services of our friend and late colleague have been fully dwelt upon by others, and I shall try as far as possible to avoid repetition of their remarks.

HENRY ZENOS OSBORNE lived a long, honorable, upright, and useful life. He was born the son of a country minister in New Lebanon, N. Y., October 4, 1848. In that Christian home he was raised "in the fear and admonition of the Lord" and was taught a patriotic love of country and zeal for human liberty that he carried with him through life; and when he laid down life's burden at his home in Los Angeles on the 8th of this month and passed the border that separates time from eternity his "mortal put on immortality," and he entered into the reward of the just.

Captain Osborne was the only Civil War veteran on the Union side who served in the Sixty-seventh Congress; and Maj. Charles M. Stedman, of North Carolina, is the only veteran who served in the Confederate Army who is a Member of this Congress. They were both reelected as Members of the Sixty-eighth Congress. They had an affection for each other that was touching, and they both rejoiced that this is a united and happy country, dedicated to human liberty under the Constitution and the law. Mr. OSBORNE received a common-school education in his home town. At the age of 13 he was apprenticed to learn the printing business, and at the age of 16 had mastered the trade. The Civil War was in progress. At that tender age he enlisted as a private in Company E, One hundred and ninety-second New York Volunteer Infantry, and served with distinction to the close of the war, when he was honorably discharged and immediately obtained work as a printer in a newspaper office. Our country and our institutions are safe and will remain safe as long as the manhood of America Is not too proud or cowardly to fight, not too proud or lazy to work, and not too weak or vicious to lead moral God-fearing lives. For a number of years in cities of the North and of the South Captain Osborne worked at the case as a typesetter and on newspapers as a reporter and editor and as a special correspondent, always learning, always advancing, always making good. In 1873, at the age of 24, he was president of the New Orleans Typographical Union and three years thereafter was elected first vice president of the International Typographical Union, and he remained a member of the Typographical Union, either active or honorary, until his death.

In 1878 he removed to Bodie, Calif., where for six years he published the Daily Free Press, engaged in gold mining, and was the United States receiver for public moneys. In 1884 he removed with his family to Los Angeles, which at that time had a population of but 15,000, and for 13 years edited and published the Evening Express. He soon became one of the business, fraternal, and political leaders in the State, and more particularly in Los Angeles. He was one of the most important factors in the development of the State south of the Tehachapi and in the marvelous development of that wonder city, Los Angeles, that in the brief space of 40 years has grown from a village to a metropolitan city of nearly 800,000 prosperous and happy people. The Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce is the most effectively organized and the most efficient of any chamber of commerce in the country. He was one of its charter members and one of its early presidents, and much of its success is due to his energy and advice. He was one of the organizers of the chamber of mines and oils. He served a term as collector of customs, as United States marshal, and as commissioner of the board of public works, was an active member of the Grand Army of the Republic, Sons of the Revolution, Masonic fraternity, Knights Templars, and Shriners; was one of the organizers of the Southern California Editorial Association and the California Press Association, and held office in all of the civic and fraternal societies of which he was a member. He was a delegate to the Republican National Convention in 1888 and for 10 years was a member of the Republican State central committee of California.

He was married in 1872 to Miss Helen Annas, of Cazenovia, I. Y., and to them were born four sons and one daughter.

They all, with a number of grandchildren, survive him.
Captain Osborne was a thorough American and a genuine Christian gentleman. He was not carried away by present-day fads, fancies, and fanaticisms. He did not follow false gods in religion, politics, or government. He had an abiding faith in gospel christianity, the Republican Party, and in American constitutional government. The outstanding traits of his character were his love for his family, his loyalty to his friends, his personal and political honesty, his intense patriotism, and his liberality. He was one of the solid, sound, dependable Members of this House. He thought straight and acted right, and during the three terms he served in Congress no one had a better record for hard, intelligent, constructive work. He has left to his family the record of a well-spent life.

When the end approached, Captain OSBORNE realized death was near, so he wrote a letter of farewell to his friends, asking his son, Sherrill B. Osborne, to see its contents was passed on to them to show his appreciation of their "staunch friend-The letter read in part as follows:

Life is made happy only by friendship. My own life has been a treasury rich in friendships, and whatever I may be credited in accomplishing has been because of the true friends in so many walks of life. They have been staunch, true friends, and their confidence and support have always been a comfort to me. I never counted as very important among life's ambitions the accumulation of worldly riches. Money is good only in its wise expenditure for others. But I always felt that service for my fellows, so far as my ability lay, brought me the greatest reward, and I have felt repaid that I have devoted most of my life in public service.

To his aged bereaved widow, to his children and his grandchildren, and to his constituents we extend our sincere sympathy at their irreparable loss, but we hope it may comfort them to know how highly he was regarded by his colleagues in the House of Representatives of the American Congress.

> UNITED STATES SENATE. COMMITTEE ON PATENTS, February 23, 1923.

Hon. CHAS. F. CURRY, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN CURRY: Hon. HENRY Z. OSBORNE, of whom you speak to-day, ably and zealously served the people of the tenth congressional district of our State. He was a kindly, considerate, and gentle man. With a high appreciation of his trust, he conscientiously fulfilled its every duty and requirement. His service has been long, characterized always by fidelity and ability. He justly held a high rank among the people of our State, and he maintained that high rank by the splendid ability with which he performed his duties. He won and deserved the gratitude and deep appreciation of his constituents.

Sincerely yours,

HIRAM W. JOHNSON.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, February 25, 1923.

Hon. CHARLES F. CURRY, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CURRY: I crave the sad privilege of joining with you and other Members of the House of Representatives in paying tribute to the late HENRY Z. OSBORNE, of California. To observe him in private or in public life was to admire him; to know him was to love him. It may be truthfully said that his long and useful life was devoted to his country. As a mere youth he served his country on battle field; in his mature manhood he served his country here, in National Legislative Hall, and his record is one of honor, without blot or stain. His memory will long be cherished by the State he in part represented and by the great district he served so vigilantly and so well. And now, "after life's fitful fever," he rests. Peace to his manly, gentle soul, and consolation to relatives and friends who mourn.

Yours in all sincerity,

SAMUEL M. SHORTRIDGE.

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Speaker, many centuries ago the title of a Roman citizen carried with it both honor and protection. To-day, whosoever can say "I am an American citizen has a distinction which is grander and enjoys privileges which are greater than ever granted by the imperial city in the days of its supreme power and grandeur.

HENRY ZENAS OSBORNE Was a representative of the highest type of American citizenship. He united in his character the gentleman, the soldier, the legislator, and the citizen, all in the most perfect harmony of those qualities which challenged admiration in both his public and private life. He was absolutely truthful and thoroughly honest in his business relations, charitable in judgment toward those with whom he differed, and his fortitude in adversity was unstinted.

Another predominant trait of his character was his great desire for active military life. He was devoted to the cause of the Union of the States, and at the age of 16, in the War between the States, enlisted as a private in Company E, One hundred and ninety-second New York Volunteer Infantry, and was honorably discharged at the close of the war. He was entirely free from sectional bias, and numbered amongst his warmest friends those who had fought under the banners of Lee and Jackson. What were the causes which produced the mighty struggle between the Northern and Southern States, and how far we of the South were justified in the course pursued by us in that unhappy strife, he cheerfully left to the judgment of future

Mr. Osborne's spirit of enterprise carried him to Bodie, Calif., in 1878, and from that year until 1884 he was editor and publisher of the Bodie Daily Free Press, when he removed to Los Angeles and became one of the pioneers in the organization of the commercial activities of that beautiful and wonderful city. He contributed very largely toward molding the sentiment upon which was founded the character of the people of that section of our country, which, within itself, is a mighty empire—a land of health, of industry and of freedom, of ardent zeal, dauntless energy, and great aspirations. Nature has marked it out for an exalted destiny.

He possessed to an unlimited degree the confidence and esteem of the people amongst whom he dwelt. He was elected to the Sixty-fifth, Sixty-sixth, and Sixty-seventh Congresses by unprecedented majorities. As a Member of the House of Representatives he enjoyed the friendship of all who had the good fortune of his acquaintance and association.

On the 8th day of February, 1923, surrounded by friends, he died at his home in that beautiful land he loved so well, leaving a name unsullied and without reproach, respected, and honored throughout our common country.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, Representative Henry Z. Os-Borne was a valuable Member of this House. He was worthy of the high esteem in which he was held. In personal character genial, courteous, lovable, and above reproach; in the public service diligent, capable, and a soldier of the common good.

He was a public-spirited citizen and entered actively into the community life in the various places of his residence. He was responsible in a notable degree for the remarkable growth and development of the city of Los Angeles. In his trade as printer and his business as editor and publisher he exerted a beneficial influence from New York to California.

Imbued with a youthful patriotic fervor, he enlisted in the Civil War at the age of 16 years and served until its close. The sense of a call to the public service for the good of his country never left him, and his activities were untiring for the common good in local and general political matters

He held many offices of honor, profit, and trust with honor to himself and benefit to the public.

His long life was one of unusual distinction. He was a man the people delighted to honor. He was a public servant in the most exalted sense in which that term is used in the Republiche served the people well.

We all were glad when we knew that he had been elected a Member of the Sixty-eighth Congress and sincerely lamented his departure from our membership.

He will be cherished in memory by a grateful Republic for what he was and did as citizen, soldier, patriot, and statesman. He has fought his good fight; he has finished his useful course; he has kept faith with the public; henceforth there is laid up for him a right reward by the Lord, the just Judge.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I have here several letters, one from Senator Johnson and one from Senator Shortridge, of California. With the permission of the House, I will print them with my remarks in 8-point type.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the permission is granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. CURRY. I have also been requested, Mr. Speaker, to be permission of the House for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Madden], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, of which Mr. Osborne was a member; Mr. Dempsey, chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, of which Mr. Osborne was formerly a member; Mr. Byrns of Tennessee, ranking member of the Committee on Appropriations; the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], who is detained at home by sickness; and the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. McArthub] to extend their remarks in the Record on the life, character, and services of Captain OSBORNE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, that permission is granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. CURRY resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore. The SPEAKER pro tempore. In accordance with the resolution heretofore adopted, the House will stand adjourned.

Accordingly the House (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Monday, February 26, 1923, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

Monday, February 26, 1923.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m. The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following

Our Father, we come to Thee this morning, grateful for Thy goodness and seeking help according to the duties that may demand our attention. Enable us always to feel that Thou art ready and accessible to us in every hour of need and when emergency confronts us. So guide us along the pathway of duty that Thy will may be fulfilled. Through Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. Curtis and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

BALTIMORE & OHIO RAILBOAD SIDING IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BALL. On last Thursday I gave notice of a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate concurred in the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3083) authorizing the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. to construct an elevated railroad siding adjacent to its tracks in the city of Washington. I now ask leave to withdraw that motion.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the request of the Senator from

Delaware

The VICE PRESIDENT. To withdraw the motion to reconsider the action of the Senate in concurring in the amendment of the House to Senate bill 3083.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that he withhold his request for the present and let the Senate proceed with the regular order of business in order that some of us may have an opportunity to investigate the subject matter of the motion to reconsider.

It will be recalled that a few days ago the Senator from Delaware entered a motion to reconsider the action of the Senate on the amendment of the House to Senate bill 3083, stating that a serious error had been made in concurring therein. Now the claim is made by some persons who are interested in the measure that the construction of the railroad tracks contemplated would operate to annoy patients in the hospital adjacent. I do not know whether that is true or not. They claim that they have been denied a hearing. In view of all these circumstances I ask the Senator to withhold his request for the present, and I demand the regular order.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I would like to make a statement relative to the matter. I made the motion to reconsider when an appeal was made to me that the tracks constructed on the square involved, as authorized by the bill, would materially affect the comfort of patients in the Methodist hospital. I did not have the time to go down and inspect the physical conditions there and still allow myself sufficient time to make the motion within the rule. So I made the motion to reconsider before going to inspect the place.

On Saturday I inspected the conditions surrounding the hospital and the square involved and all other matters connected therewith. I find that there are 25 railroad tracks nearer the hospital than would be any of the tracks constructed on this

When the hospital was built the Baltimore & Ohio Somare. Railroad had its tracks covering this square. The hospital was built in 1896. The Baltimore & Ohio changed us tracks, I think, in 1903. The square is at least one-third of a mile away from the hospital. Two squares filled by tracks lie between the square and the hospital. It is impossible for anybody inspecting conditions there to conceive that the tracks proposed to be constructed in this square merely for switching will affect the hospital in the least.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President-

Mr. BALL. Some of the Baltimore & Ohio tracks are less than half the distance from the hospital than would be the tracks to be constructed on this square. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming

Mr. KENDRICK. I want to ask the Senator from Delaware if it is not true that to deny the right of trackage to the railroad would be to increase a sort of monopoly of property that now has the trackage

Mr. BALL. It would be.

Mr. KENDRICK. And to make it more difficult for the people who require railroad conveniences and facilities of that kind to secure at a reasonable cost property which could be used for that purpose.

Mr. BALL. That is true. The tracks are to be used for the purpose of increasing facilities for the distribution to the city of coal and other materials. I can not conceive of any person having any objection to the construction of the track if he would make an inspection of the surroundings.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if it is the Lucy Webb Hayes Hospital?

Mr. BALL. It is. Mr. JONES of Washington. I received a protest from that institution this morning-

Mr. BALL. Every Senator has received one.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have not had time to examine I think the matter should be very carefully looked into. From what the Senator has said, he has looked into it carefully; but I have not had the time to do so.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I call for the regular order. The VICE PRESIDENT. Petitions and memorials are in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry. Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Delaware announced his purpose to withdraw the motion to reconsider. Having entered the motion to reconsider, that motion can not be withdrawn except by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. I object to the withdrawal of the motion for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the presentation of petitions and memorials.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry. Mr. BALL. Objection is made to the withdrawal of my motion to reconsider. Unless the motion is withdrawn, of course the bill is killed. I made the motion with the understanding that there was some possible objection by the hospital authorities to the construction of the tracks. I find upon inspection that there can be no real objection. I do not wish my motion to hold up the bill. After having thoroughly considered the conditions there, I am convinced the motion should be with-It is unfair to place me in the position of killing the bill. I would like to withdraw my motion to reconsider, and then if the Senator from Arkansas wishes to make such a motion, well and good.

No; that is the difficulty. By making the Mr. ROBINSON. motion himself the Senator precluded other Senators from exercising that privilege, and now, after the expiration of the two days within which such a motion could be made, if his motion be withdrawn it would be too late for any other Senator to There is no disposition to defeat the bill if make the motion. upon further investigation it appears that the bill ought to pass. But the Senator himself, after having reported the bill and caused its passage through the Senate, requested the Senate to reconsider its action on the ground, as he expressly stated at the time, that a mistake had been made. Now, every Senator has received a communication-

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I call for the regular order. The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the presentation of petitions and memorials.

EUROPEAN CONDITIONS-ARTICLE BY SENATOR M'CORMICK.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Record, in the regular Record type, an article by the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCormick] which appeared in the Saturday Evening Post of February 17, 1923, entitled "Political panaceas or economic remedies for Europe."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post.] POLITICAL PANACEAS OR ECONOMIC REMEDIES FOR EUROPE. (By Medill McCormick, Senator from Illinois.)

"Europe is sick. We all know that. But what is the matter with her? In five years I have been to Europe three times—in 1917, when I visited England, France, and Italy; in the winter of 1919-20 again, when I visited Hungary, Austria, Czecho-slovakia, Serbia, Poland, Germany, Italy, France, Belgium, and England; a third time this winter, when I visited France, Germany, Belgium, and England. On each of these visits, of course, I talked with responsible leaders of opinion in the world of politics, business, and journalism. Many of them were old friends. From all of them I know I heard the absolute truth as they saw it and believed it. It is from these visits and from these contacts that I derived the impressions that I venture to set forth here as representing the present posture of affairs on the Continent of Europe.

"Europe is sick with a variety of ills, due to many causes, none of them curable by anything which the American people or their Government might do, unless and until the peoples and the Governments of Europe have first decided to put aside political panaceas in favor of less palatable but more effective economic remedies. It would be fruitless to cancel the debts due our Government from other governments; it would be fruitless to add to the $8,000,000,000 or $10,000,000,000 that we have advanced them from public or private credits since the armistice, so long as there obtain on the Continent the policies which have actuated the majority of the financially embarrassed Governments since the signing of the armistice. It has been hard for the vanquished to acknowledge their defeat and its consequences, as it has been hard for the victors to realize that in a great war victors and vanquished, wrongdoers and wronged, all must pay, even as the people of the United States, remote from the war center, not even party to the political and commercial rivalry that preceded the war, have paid and are "In western Europe, and more especially upon the Continent, there is very generally an attitude toward the United States that is not easy for us to understand. There are in Europe sensible and presumably informed people who think and talk as if we had been saved by the allied effort, forgetting their perilous position in the winter of 1917-18; there are people who seem to believe that because we have suffered less than the European peoples who were involved in the European war we have suffered none at all, and have even waxed rich as a result of the war. Throughout Europe there is a certain articulate element, encouraged by the outgivings of certain New York bankers, who would make it appear that America has played the rôle of a Shylock. Consequently, not only among the peoples of western Europe and the Central Empires but among those of the neutral States there has been engendered against America a real though unreasoning irritation because she does not open her purse strings, because she does not incontinently lend more—without security—to those who are now unable to pay, and who are still unwilling to reform their finances and to curtail their expenditures, civil as well as military.

HISTORIC RIVALRIES AND PRESENT POLICIES.

"I do not mean to compare the feeling toward America with that which old allies, as well as old enemies, bear toward one There are European peoples who fought side by side another. who are animated by a hateful jealousy of one another as bitter as the rancor which they still treasure against their enemies in the Great War. Their historic rivalries—like that between France and England-the wars, the feuds, the alliances, which for 500 years have marked the flux of their fortunes, all contribute to present policy. During the last three or four generations Germany, Italy, and probably Poland, have been added to the number of great powers. France has suffered a relative decline in population. Italy is a more populous State than France. To-day they are jockeying for to-morrow.

"A traveler would be very cocksure to set down absolutely and in sequence the relative stability of the various European States, but looking back to 1919 and 1917, the British are farthest on the road to recovery. Conditions—political, social, and economic, all considered together—are more nearly normal in England than in any other European country that took part in the war. Belgium follows second, France third, and Italy fourth. Germany is in a grave, perhaps desperate condition, and until she begins to advance it is useless to attempt to appraise the present as a basis for the future in any of the States to the east and to the south of her.

"The recovery of Europe depends upon a definitive and reasonable settlement of the relations between Germany and France, and the beginning of their economic and financial recovery. If that is not accomplished this year, no man dare predict how serious the future may be or how far the processes of disintegration may go or how far the mark, the lira, and the franc may fall. The Austrian crown, which to-day sells for 70,000 to the dollar after the heroic efforts of the allied governments to stabilize it, once was worth 20 cents; the mark, which was worth a fraction less than a quarter, at this writing is selling at 10,000 to a dollar; the franc, which was worth 20 cents, is now worth 7 cents. Unless a settlement be reached there is no more reason why it should sell for 7 cents than for 5 cents or for 3.

"The chronic deficit in the French budget is met not by printing francs but by printing issues of bonds. What must happen when bond buying ceases? The disorder in the finances of the Governments, the collapse of their credit and the depreciation of their currencies increasingly paralyze industry and trade, because they drive the producers of Europe to wasteful, primitive barter for the exchange of goods. It is a miracle that Europe has been able to buy from us as much as she has since the war. She could not have done it but for the billions in credits which we risked abroad while there was some security available, hundreds of millions of which doubtless we have lost.

"It was presumed by some of the European and by practically all the American supporters of the treaty of Versailles that the Reparation Commission, created under the treaty, would be an independent body, its members free from the domination of political cabinets, at liberty wisely to discharge their functions. their functions. They were to have been, so it seemed, a commission of receivers in bankruptcy. If they had been that, discharging their duty conformably with established practice in business, they would have regarded Germany as a great enterprise, her capital impaired, her railways and her factories out of repair, her soil depleted for want of its accustomed annual fertilization, but none the less a great enterprise which, once rehabilitated, could pay large sums by way of reparations.

We know perfectly well that the commission has not been free; that its members have been mere mouthpieces for the several prime ministers who guided their every act and dictated the terms of their every statement; we know that it has not been guided by a consistent policy, by prudence, or by economic wisdom; that it has not had the confidence of the several allies; it has not made a plan and has not been per-mitted to make a plan that would inspire the German people to pay and thus win their ultimate economic and political free-dom, and so induce them to labor, to produce, and to save.

"Now that England has parted from her continental allies upon the issue of reparations it is worth taking note of the fate of the reparations clauses under the other treaties, those of Sevres, St.-Germain, Neuilly, and the Trianon. The Turks have torn up the treaty of Sevres; according to the press dispatches Bulgaria and Hungary, in view of their territorial losses, have refused to pay reparations in cash, credits, or kind; Austria is not merely unable to pay any reparations whatever, but, saved from starvation by America, to-day is seeking to re-establish her finances with credits granted her by the allies.

"If four States, each of them with less than 10,000,000 population, can successfully resist the collection of reparations, what effort must the three Latin powers, now drawn away from Great Britain, put forth to coerce the Germans to attempt payments beyond the resources of Germany to pay? It seems only the other day that supine Egypt, by persistent passive resistance to the British administration of the country, compelled the British to abandon their protectorate established by the treaties of peace and to withdraw British complexes. of peace and to withdraw British garrisons and British ad-ministrators from the valley of the Nile.

"It is only yesterday that the military, political, and economic forces of 40,000,000 British were unable to continue the 700-year-old British Government of 4,000,000 Irish. If Italy, France, and Belgium, in collaboration with Great Britain, could not enforce uneconomic terms as against German bank-ruptcy or German passive resistance, how can the three con-tinental States do so when they not only have lost British support but when British opinion is against them? Here we are, three years after the signing of the treaty of Versailles, and for the first time the allied prime ministers have fixed as an amount within the capacity of Germany to pay the sum of 50,000,000,000 gold marks, a sum a little in excess of the amount within the capacity of the excess of the amount within the capacity of the excess of the amount within the capacity of the excess of the amount within the capacity of the excess of the amount within the capacity of the excess of the amount within the capacity of the excess of the amount within the capacity of the excess of the amount within the capacity of the excess of the amount within the capacity of the excess of established three years ago by J. M. Keynes, and something less than the amount proposed by B. M. Baruch and the other American advisers to President Wilson during the Paris conference. Note the sum was fixed by the prime ministers, not by the Reparation Commission. Whenever any important thing is done-at Spa, London, Paris, anywhere-the prime ministers agree or disagree. The Reparation Commission has become a rubber stamp.

Of course, a great deal more than time has been lost during these three sad years. If the German railways and some of the German plants have been restored, the fertility of her soil has not increased, her currency and credit have terribly depreciated, capital has taken flight from her borders, and the whole German people have lost confidence in the solvency and efficiency of their own Government. At the same time, French finances have gone from bad to worse, and worse. Economists and bankers who have studied the French revenues, and the ability of the country to support increased taxation as against the annual national interest charge, and the costs of the civil and military establishments, are unable to find any way in which France can balance her budget unless she writes the franc down to a permanent value of 5 cents gold. This would permit a very considerable increase of taxation in terms of francs without any increase of goods produced. It would be a form of capital levy upon the holders of Government bonds.

THE FRENCHMAN AND HIS SAVINGS.

"France suffers directly and indirectly from most of the ills that affect the other European States. She suffers mentally, not only because she consciously fears the renascence of German power, and therefore the prospect of another German invasion, but because unconsciously the mass of the people are beginning to be alarmed by the ominous financial outlook. This is not apparent at first, partly because it does not jump to the eye, and partly because the newly arrived traveler at first is not capable of appreciating the evidence. When I landed at Cherbourg last November, the franc bore about the same relation to the dollar that it bore two years ago. made no impression on me when for a second time in three years I bought three times as many francs for a dollar as I could have bought before the war or even in 1917. I had no understanding that the French for three long years had anxiously hoped that the franc would steadily rise toward its pre-war value.
"When I came to my hotel in Paris and was made welcome by the old manager, whom I knew and who eagerly and hospitably sought to arrange my quarters conveniently, he asked me at once if I did not feel that the franc was very weak and pretty bad. It had dropped during 48 hours, I discovered, from cents to 6 cents in value. If he thought upon the franc, he was thinking of the mark and wondering if the franc would start in precipitous pursuit of the diminished currencies of central and eastern Europe.

"The depreciation of the franc for the time being has wiped out a large part of the savings of the French people, all of whom practically are investors in bonds of the French Government or of a multitude of municipalities, prefectures, and public utilities of France, in which great numbers of Frenchmen and Frenchwomen invest to the exclusion of securities of any other But more than that, the French are a proud and sensitive people. They may be individually indifferent to instance of public corruption and political inefficiency; they may individually criticize their Government bifterly and cynically, but none the less they can not bring themselves to accept the idea that although the pound sterling during two years has risen from 60 to over 90 per cent of par of the dollar, the franc remains at 33 per cent of its gold value, and may forever remain at that ratio unless German reparations are paid in an amount which Frenchmen begin to realize never can be paid.

"Two years ago, as compared with the capitals of central Europe, Paris had made an astonishing recovery. light, which in 1917 had been dark and cold, with unheated houses and ill-swept streets, in the winter of 1919-20 was as clean and brilliantly lighted as before, while Vienna, Warsaw, and Berlin were still dark, cold, shivering, and shattered. Paris, visibly then, is no more brilliant to-day than it was two years ago, except that there are not so many people in mourning on the streets, in the shops, or other public places. I am not an experienced and accurate judge of the displays in shop windows, but this year my wife noticed with renewed surprise each day that nowhere on the Rue de la Paix or the Avenue de l'Opéra were the window displays so varied or so rich as those, ample, which she had seen in New York before sailing for Europe, or as those which she saw again in London before returning home. Plainly, the well-to-do shopping public in Paris, not only French but foreign, has less collective purchasing power than the shopping public in London or in New York. Whatever may be said of the burden of taxation and the wealth per capita in France, I know from what I saw and heard that many, many French people, no matter what their fortunes and incomes may be, no matter how the foreigners who crowd their watering places may live, are living more frugally, more modestly than ever before, thinking all the while upon the present and ultimate value of their investments in French securities.

"We were interested in the other shops, but we were concerned about the toy shops, where we wished to gather a little Christmas bundle to carry to our young people at home. I remembered the times which as a boy I had spent in Parls, when with the little French boys we launched exquisite little ships, steam driven and sailing, upon the ponds in the Tulleries Gardeus, and the windows of the toy shops in the Rue de Rivoll were crowded with ingenious mechanical toys. We were disappointed in the shops that we discovered. We went, upon the advice of French friends, to the best toy shop in Paris, but could find no toy engine—stationary, locomotive, or marine—which would match the realities of my youth and meet my promises to my small son. The toys, like the other displays in the shop windows, made it evident that even here the French, who are devoted and generous parents, are not buying toys as they did before.

FRENCH FRUGALITY.

"We dined, my wife and I, with an old friend of mine and his wife. As French fortunes go, theirs is large. They are serious, active, public-spirited people. During the war Madame acquitted herself with great credit as a volunteer nurse, and her husband with equal credit as an officer. They feared a second invasion; they believed that in the Rhine there should be set up either an independent Rhenish State or at least a Rhenish Province, as independent of Prussia as is Bavaria. They were concerned by the failure of the reparations policy; like very many others, they recognized the apparent insolubility of the problem of the French debt, but none the less were resolutely, courageously, magnificently confident in the ultimate solution of the problem and the restoration of the franc to par. My friend held up a piece of paper as if it were a French bank note, the better to emphasize his assertion to my wife, and insisted that if his bank note were locked up to-day, in 50 years it would have a better value than a note for the same sum in pounds sterling. He saw France restored and in the future drawing great wealth from her prosperous and loyal colonies in Northern Africa, while he looked forward with equal confidence to the dissolution of the British Empire, the establishment of the Dominions as independent States, and to the ultimate disintegration of British rule in India. But his great town house, which had been open three years ago, was closed.

"It is very easy for the foreigner and casual traveler to fail to appreciate the domestic and frugal character of the average Frenchman. Deauville and Dinard, Paris, Cannes, and Monte Carlo no more represent to the traveler a true picture of France than Atlantic City and Newport represent America. It might be said that the Frenchman lives to save a competence and dies to bequeath it to his one or two children. There are French publicists who believe that the equality of successionthat is, the absolute requirement of the law that an inheritance must be equally divided among children-is the cause of the low French birth rate, for no French farmer who has inherited or acquired land can bear to see that land so divided that it no longer constitutes a sufficient and efficient farm. If he inherits a farm he must save enough aside, assuming that he has two children, so that he may leave the farm intact to one and his rentes or Government bonds to the other. Now, manifestly, the depreciation of the franc has not affected the prosperity of the farm. The vegetables, the poultry, the cattle or the crops are as rich as before, and are sold for three times as many francs as before. But that part of his property which was invested in Government securities when francs were at par or over par brings him no more francs in interest than be-

"The small bourgeois, too, has seen the great part of his savings wiped out. It is not merely that his comfort in his old age is threatened; that his prospect for retiring with his wife from Lyon or Marseille or Paris to a villa just beyond the suburbs is gone, but his self-esteem, his position, and the position which he had thought to assure his children—all may be jeonardized.

"It is difficult for the rest of the world to understand France; so it is difficult for France to understand the rest of the world. The French, who have an old and a great civilization, are intellectually, geographically, physically, and personally, shall I say, the most self-contained people in the western world. They do not emigrate; they travel very little; their newspapers carry but meager dispatches from abroad; they feel that they do not need to know any language but their own, the old language of diplomatic intercourse. If they do not leave France they seldom leave the neighborhood in which they are born and reared. Their foreign investments have not been commercial or varied, and a very large part of them in Mexico, Turkey, Bulgaria, and Russia have proved bad. Thus they live almost unto themselves alone, and feel that the civilization and security of France constitute the quintessence of all civilized peoples. France has been a great power, and they are resolute to maintain her position as a great power despite her crippled finances and her stationary population. There are many reasons for the French determination to maintain a great army, but among them certainly is its weight as a diplomatic counterpolse against the British fleet. Hence their decision to levy legions in Asia and Africa—those in Africa including not only shock troops from Madagascar and the Senegal, but some Semitic and Berber battalions from Tunis, Algeria, and Morocco. Hence, also, their failure to appreciate the feeling engendered in other countries, and especially in England and America, against the garrisoning of German villages by Mohammedan troops. This intellectual and economic isolation of France in the heart of Europe not only explains her indifference to American and British opinion but explains in part also her attitude toward reparations.

"There are no new business enterprises launched every day in France, as with us. Real estate does not change so frequently as in the United States. The bonds of the treasury or the bonds of the State or municipal rentes afford to the average Frenchman his chief opportunity for investment. It was precisely because he had this habit of investment in public securities that it was so easy during the 10 years before the outbreak of the war to sell him the bonds of the Government of the emperor and autocrat of all the Russlans. Here, of course, is the reason for French bitterness against the Bolshevik Government, which has repudiated the bonds held by hundreds of thousands of small French investors.

DEBTS AND DEBTORS.

"I remember an evening spent in a small company of diplomats, politicians, and bankers, one of whom was all three. He is important enough as a politician to be a statesman, and as a banker had had not a little to do with investment in Russia before the war. He said that he considered that recognition of Russia was of no present economic importance. He told me, to my surprise, that before the war the average annual export of Russian wheat was little more than twice the average annual consumption by little Belgium. I asked him with what Russia paid for her large imports which the British were anxious to reestablish—with her raw hides and raw flax which she sold in central and western Europe? He said no; that Russia had bought abroad with the earnings of the French people, constantly lent to Russia through Russian bonds sold in France.

"Here, then, the French people are confronted with the hitherto insoluble reparations problem. They charge that the Germans have sought to evade payment; they have insisted that Germany was not devastated during the war; they have proved that with the currencies of the two countries reduced to a common basis, Germany has paid far, far less in taxes than France. But they have not been willing to receive, except to a limited extent, German labor in France or German deliveries in kind. Certainly it is intelligible to us Americans that French tile manufacturers, or French brick manufacturers, or French cement manufacturers, who since early in 1919 have been producing on a prodigious scale for the reconstruction of the devastated region, should resist the influx of a great quantity of German tile, brick, or cement, with the consequent effect upon the French market for those goods. It has been the official opinion of the French Government-now strongly denied by some individual Frenchmen-that the population of the restricted region would never tolerate in their midst the presence of German workmen, laboring to rebuild the ruln that the German general staff wrought. I have heard, of course, from countrymen and countrywomen, who have spent the summer in French watering places or traveling leisurely through France, that many French people were no longer friendly to Americans. Certainly the bitterness toward Wilson, although not comparable with that toward Lloyd George, is general. The French feel that both have let them down. But I can not remember any American who told me that he had been discourteously used. Certainly old friends whom I saw, and who disapproved and absolutely condemned the opinions I held upon the treaties and upon the reparations question, were generous and hospitable. None the less, one only has to remark the note on the French budget that the debt of the French Government to the American Government is regarded as political; one only has to recall the allusions of Clemenceau and Longuet to cancellation; one only has to remember the references of Clemenceau and others to an economic imperialism as dangerous as any military imperialism, to realize that the French contemplate as inevitable the cancellation of the French debt to America and wish us to agree to it. It was the theory of some of the most distinguished Frenchmen in 1917 that all the allied debts should be pooled and prorated to the several countries in proportion to their natural wealth and natural resources. Under this French plan we would have assumed the greater part of all the international war debt, and thus what cancellation contemplates now would have been accomplished. In 1919 there were responsible Frenchmen who hoped for another loan of a billion dollars from our Government.

FRANCE'S INTERNAL DEBT.

"I think that to-day there is no French financial expert-I speak now of professional economists and financiers-who will say that he can sit down with a pencil and paper and find a solution of the problem of the French debt. The debt is growing. Practically all the revenue of the country is now absorbed in the service of the debt, while the annual deficit, now amounting roughly to $500,000,000 gold a year, is equal to the annual outlay upon the French military and civil establishment, exclusive of all reparations charges. There is no impartial judge who believes that Germany can pay more than $10,000,000,000, and that over a period of 20 years, with little or nothing annually to begin with, and the greater part of it during the second decade. What then, your French financier may ask, can France do in the matter of her debt to America, if she can not balance her own budget except by the permanent depreciation of the franc, which in itself is an indirect repudiation of, say, a third or a half of that internal debt which is in the hands of the small French investors in every community in France?

PARIS TO THE RHINE.

"The road from Paris to the Rhine cities carries the motorist through Belleau Wood and Verdun, past villages and farmsteads in course of reconstruction to Metz, past Treves, where are quartered the Moroccan troops. Verdun in winter is still a waste, like Gustave Dore's picture of the Frozen Hell, but in the summer, the commandant told me, the scrub brush and other verdure which has sprung up have filled the shell holes and covered the once blasted hillsides. Verdun, the Morte Homme, Souville, still stand as witnesses to the ruin and waste of war. The countryside presents less evidence of the damage done by the Germans. You may, of course, notice new tile roofs among the old and know that they cover rebuilt cottages and houses. You will at intervals find frame dwellings-temporary shelters certainly beside the stone cottages in which the French peas-ant has been accustomed to dwell—but as weatherproof and as comfortable as many a settler's shack which not so many years ago we saw in western Kansas and Nebraska or upon hilly clearings in the canyons of the Rockies or the Sierras. You will see fewer ruined or unfinished warehouses and factories than you will see unfinished or ruined cottages, for a great number of factories have been rebuilt, as many proportionately as there are proportionately few cottages reconstructed. I do not pretend to know whether influence secured the reconstruction of the buildings of the large manufacturer rather than those of the small peasant, or whether France was unwise in rebuilding factories beyond present needs, or whether in the long run it will prove to have been sound policy. Whatever the truth may be, there is have been sound policy. Whatever the truth may be, there is very considerable discontent on the part of the peasants, who have seen the factories rebuilt while they still are living in temporary cottages, and on the part of very many more who sympathize with them. This discontent, as you may hear public men say in France, requires the Government to secure reparations or to take other steps to make good to the peasants what already has been made good to the manufacturers.

"The countryside in the autumn is plowed and prosperous.

You may see grazing in the farmyards dairy cattle of German The names of the villages and those over the shops on the narrow streets slowly change as you pass through Alsace until they become absolutely all German. When your passport has been examined, your automobile number registered, and your baggage ignored, you find yourself across the border and under the government of the International Commission of the Saar. The economic assimilation of the Saar to France con-The franc is driving out the mark, and a steadily increasing portion of the trade is with France; the whole population is infinitely busy mining coal for France, and enjoying a prosperity that the French hope will lead them to vote themselves French in a few years, as the treaty requires that they may have an opportunity to do. They are busy and prosper-ous, and I am certain that their numbers are increasing, for at frequent intervals and on both sides of the road there were new buildings and buildings in the course of construction which a good many French business men in the hotel. Frankfort could only have been put up to house an increasingly prosper-ous and growing population.

At first after we left the frontier there was little evidence of French occupation. As we were driven gingerly over the snow-covered hills about the valleys tributary to the Rhine, the great numbers of children-children everywhere, in the streets, in the school yards, and on the doorsteps—forced themselves on our attention. In France there are less than 40,000,000 people; in Europe, within and without the new frontiers of Germany, there are between eighty and ninety million Germans, and the disparity is still growing.

A FANTASTIC CURRENCY.

"The German countryside looks prosperous, better tilled, and better kept than it was three years ago, but, in western Germany, noticeably bereft of cattle. The people in the villages, as in the cities, have been, I will not say well nourished, but better nourished than when I visited in 1919, at which time they had not recovered from the long period of semistarvation. Then the American relief mission was still feeding thousands upon thousands of children in the larger cities. If you stop, as we did, to break your fast and spend the night, you have the first arresting proof of the change. The mark was still worth a couple of cents when I was in Germany three years ago. Your pocketbook was not inconveniently bulky. The currency amused you or gave you reason to think, according to your temperament. Now it is fantastic and tragic. The penciled prices on the printed bill of fare are changed sometimes daily and always weekly. You pay several hundred marks for a piece of fried carp or for a quart of mineral water. You pay an unimaginable sum, in marks, for your room, which you are formally advised includes the municipal tax and the national tax and the stranger's tax and the tip. You are likely to have been told by the manager or a friend that things are greatly changed and that whereas when he last had the pleasure of seeing you, before the war, you could leave your room unlocked with the certainty that nothing would be touched, now he would beg you to lock bags and room day and night. As a matter of fact, at Treves some one-I do not know whether it was a policeman, a traveler, or a sneak thief-softly tried our bedroom door twice during the night and found it bolted.

"The atmosphere in the restaurants at Treves was depressing. The tables were equally occupied by German business men and by French officers of the Moroccan and Algerian regiments in their brilliant uniforms. The conversation was hushed. There was no merrymaking or even a semblance of gayety at the tables occupied either by the Germans or by the French officers and their families.

"We stopped at Coblenz only long enough to lunch, for we had been delayed by engine trouble. I had been there before and we expected to see General Allen later. The doughboys, since ordered home, were few, not so many as French soldiers. I noticed that the principal hotel, which before had borne the common French name of the Grand Hotel Bellevue, was now the Coblenzer Hof. At lunch we were joined by some American officers, who in the course of the conversation told us of the never-ending friction between the French military and the German civilian authorities. We hurried from Coblenz to Mainz, the French bridgehead, where we saw General Degoutte, whom I had last met when I spent the day with him at the bombardment of La Malmaison. He was not so young as he had been, but as calm, painstaking, and patient as ever, rather more harassed, I thought, by the responsibilities of his command on the Rhine than he had been by those of his command in front of the Chemin des Dames during the war.

TRAVELING IN GERMANY.

"I have said that for many months the German population had been relatively well fed. It was about Christmas that considerable numbers of the industrial population began again to feel the pinch of hunger. In German cities like Cologne and Dresden there have been riots because of high prices. we were in the Rhine country the French military authorities had made ready to serve to a hungry civilian population as many as 250,000 military soups a day. Although Germany's exports now amount to less than 40 per cent of her pre-war exports, she has 90 per cent as many mouths to feed as she had before the war, and so must have between New Year and August 15, 1923, when the harvest is in, $100,000,000 worth of American breadstuffs.

"You could travel in November from Frankfort to Berlin, sleeping compartment included, for about $3. We had missed train and put up at the familiar Frankfurter Hof, we found first that the staff of the hotel was less attentive and obliging than in the old days, and second, that there were was and ought to be one of the most prosperous cities in Germany. Now, although the pedestrians were numerous, the vehicles were few, and those which were motor driven hardly to be mentioned at all. During the course of a two-hour stroll my wife and I saw, I think, four or five privately owned automobiles and something less than a dozen noisy, noisome old taxicabs. By way of contrast to the empty streets and the bundles of lithographed currency the shops made a rather brave show, but the purchasers going in or out of them were few.

"At train time the rallway station was crowded, but on the train the third or second class compartments outnumbered the first class by 20 or 30 to 1. We shared a compartment with two German gentlemen, one in the forties, a business man returning from a journey to Zurich, and the other a man of 65, who was soon immersed in the study of a folio full of papers. There was a little confusion about the reservations. Some other people came with the train guard to lay claim to our seats, and the two German gentlemen, who had a little more English than I did German, very considerately and effectively interested themselves to see that we should not be disturbed.

"At one of the stations we heard an American voice say good-by to some Mr. McCormick who left the train there, and I spoke to my wife of the coincidence in our names. Thereupon the elder of the two gentlemen asked me if I were the American political man, and we all in a moment and in a mixture of languages began to discuss the state of Germany and of the world. 'The mark,' I said, 'had some buying power when I was here two years ago.'

"When the present American ambassador arrived in Berlin in the spring it was still worth a cent, but it had fallen so far during the six months prior to my second visit that a thousand marks were then worth about a dime. What this meant in human terms the elder of the two men brought out.

"'What do you think is the prospect of a man who in the sixties has retired from business with a snug fortune of a million or two marks, enough to keep him and his old wife and to stake his sons in the continuance of the old business or the establishment of a new one, and who now finds himself in his old age, with his family, in possession of an income rather smaller than that of a young stenographer? He must go back to work.'

"With that he resumed the study of his folio of papers. He had given us an authentic autobiographical note.

EFFECTS OF THE DEPRECIATED MARK.

"At first I was less depressed by Berlin than was my wife. It is true that two years ago, coming from Vienna to Warsaw, the sounder currency, the greater commercial capacity and commercial experience of the business men in Berlin, the smaller number of children proportionately dependent upon American relief—all made one feel that in arriving in Berlin one was leaving the morass for miry but firmer ground. But after all, at that time, those who had known Berlin before the war could never shake off the feeling that before them was the spectacle of a great, highly organized, and highly energized political and industrial machine wrecked. That has become familiar now, but there are other and depressing changes.

We could criticize and complain two years ago that while America, through the Quakers, was feeding the poor the profiteers made the cafes, the restaurants, the theaters, and the shops gay with high living. They did, and they gave a superficial brilliancy to Berlin, of which I saw no trace this year. It is all dark now, and to-day, as in Vienna two years ago, the men and women whom you meet in the professional, commercial, and political world seem helpless and hopeless. very striking, for bad as things were in 1919-20, dependent as the hungry children were upon American aid, bewildered as was the commercial world of Germany by the unmeasured and immeasurable indemnity, by the ineptitude of their new government-none the less they were moved by a real will to do, to find at home, in Russia, or in southeastern Europe the means to reestablish their economic independence and to win their economic and political freedom.

"Now the property of thousands of small business men has been Bolshevized, confiscated indirectly by the depreciation of the mark and by the growing uncertainty of the value of anything. If 200 marks bought a dollar a little while ago, and it takes 10,000 to buy one now, you can understand how a business man or any other investor has lost faith in anything but land and brick and mortar. If a man had a few railway or Government bonds or a mortgage which paid him so many marks a year at a fixed rate, what was once a tidy income will not keep him a month to-day: a mortgage or a few bonds.

which were negotiable security and which assured capital for a new enterprise, are now of no value whatever to a business man.

"We were told that there are a dozen or fifteen great captains of industry, of whom Stinnes is the most conspicuous, who stand to profit greatly by what has happened in Germany. But the smaller business men, the small investors, the great bulk of the professional people, have had their savings very nearly wiped out. If I say that the German workman is better off than they because his wages have more nearly kept pace with the depreciation of the mark and the consequent increase in prices, do not imagine that he is well off. The counselor of the American Embassy told me that he paid his chauffeur a dollar a week and the cook and the maid in proportion; that he could not do otherwise on account of the many German families living in the same apartment building, and that his wife was therefore put to it to recompense them in some proportion to what they did for her by giving them presents of clothing and food.

"As I was once a newspaper publisher, I was interested to learn that a German linotype operator was paid about $1 a week and the editor of a large daily from $15 to $20 a month. If the German economic organization is weakened, the political organization is very far from strong. The world, I think, has never appreciated the task which the Germans, and, indeed, all the newly enfranchised peoples, face in organizing governments, representative and efficient, strong and responsible to public opinion. Rumania, Poland, Yugoslavia share the problem that confronts the Germans of Austria and the Reich. It takes time to train experienced democratic statesmen, to organize administrative departments anew, to develop parliamentary practice and parliamentary habits. Consider the government of these States under the Articles of Confederation and prior to the adoption of the Constitution.

"Certainly travel in Europe east of the Rhine is not comfortable, measured by the standard of American express trains; but the experienced wayfarer can go by wagonette from Berlin to Brussels without any great discomfort. It is agreeable in Brussels to emerge on the station platform in a realm of physically manageable bank notes and manageable nickel coins. Two years ago, when I had come from Vienna and Warsaw to Berlin, from the capitals of starved children and from countries where good coins had given way to rotten paper, it was as if one had climbed up out of a morass onto a higher and drier level, from which, in turn, one was to climb farther in going to France or to Belgium. Now that Germany has slipped down into the economic swamp, among all the continental States touched by the war Belgium gives the greatest impression of progress, the greatest promise of recovery and solvency. The Belgians have been industrious, where some others have not: they have been more prudent than others are. In Theunis, the prime minister and minister of finance, they are blessed with a public servant whose talent rises to the level of true statesmanship. Among the prime ministers of the northern States chiefly concerned with reparations-for I do not speak of the Italian prime minister, Mussolini, whom I have not met—M. Theunis is indubitably the ablest. This is not only my humble Theunis is indubitably the ablest. opinion but that of very nearly all the persons with whom I have talked who know Poincaré, Law, Cuno, and Theunis.

BELGIUM'S DIFFICULT POSITION.

"If Belgium gives the greatest promise of economic recovery among the continental States which engaged in the war, her political situation is none the less difficult. It is not merely that she sorely needs reparations, as does France; it is not merely that her frontiers on the east march with those of Germany, but that geographically, strategically, economically, politically she is in a situation made difficult by the growing differences between her two great allies, the French Republic and the British Empire. If her prudence, her practical commercial instinct, would lead her to vote with the British as against the French in the matter of reparations, her geographic and military situation compel her to vote and even to march with the French into the Ruhr.

"Look at the map. If French troops in considerable numbers occupy the territory from Mainz to Essen, Belgium would have the French Army to the east of her in Germany and to the west of her in France. Thus, despite the industrial activity general throughout Belgium, there are added to the anxieties about the Belgian budget and about reparations due perplexities about their relations with their former allies as well as with their former enemies.

land and brick and mortar. If a man had a few railway or Government bonds or a mortgage which paid him so many marks a year at a fixed rate, what was once a tidy income will not keep him a month to-day; a mortgage or a few bonds, nothing of the generous fare, which beckoned and welcomed one to the European country that has traveled farthest along the road to economic recovery. I have visited England three times since the outbreak of the Great War. The English point of view and the problems of the English are more complex now than they were during the terrible days when aircraft above darkened the streets of London and U-boats below made perilous the watery lanes to the English ports. Things seemed simpler even three years ago, because men were still uncertain, expectant, and sanguine about the near future.

'Now, here we were in London, where we saw streets crowded with taxis, with well-dressed people, and yet we were told that the army of the idle had dispersed only the day before and that the unemployed in the Kingdom probably numbered 1,500,-000 among a population of 40,000,000. It is as if we had had for years the millions of unemployed who sought jobs in the great cities of the country during the crisis of depression in 1920-21.

"Here we found the pound almost as good as gold, and every day read in the newspapers accounts of the appalling Irish civil war just across the channel; here the shops were rich with costly and varied stores, were thronged by Christmas shoppers, while we read in the newspapers grave accounts or heard from statesmen's lips still more ominous reports of civil disorder and resistance or fiscal disarray in India.

"The British, like ourselves, almost from the moment of their entry into the war, levied great taxes and have continued them, so that to-day they bear at least a little more heavily upon all incomes than do the corresponding income taxes of the United States. The English bear the great burden of taxation, on the whole, very cheerfully. Their financial men and economists are not so certain that they have been wholly wise in restoring the par value of the pound. Across the channel they behold the pic-ture of countries with large and continuing deficits, increasing debts, and unchecked inflation of the currency, busy, with no problem of the unemployed. How can it be otherwise than that the whole British Nation should be troubled about the idle thou-

THE PROBLEM OF UNEMPLOYMENT.

"Two authorities told me that before the outbreak of the Great War the annual exodus from the British Isles, in round numbers, amounted to half a million souls a year-to the four Dominions, to the United States, and a fraction to other parts of the world. That is to say, since 1914, 4,000,000 who might have gone overseas have stayed at home. Two and a half millions were killed or maimed in the Great War, and there are 1.500,000 unemployed. That is, the number of unemployed is exactly equal to those who have stayed home and who were neither killed nor maimed. The Dominions, whose total population of European stock is approximately equal to that of New York and Pennsylvania combined, are not able to absorb very many, and yet in a section of the British press there is carried on a continuing agitation about conditions at Ellis Island, calculated to discourage emigration to the United States.

"This attitude toward emigration illustrates the perplexing and conflicting feelings which the British bear America to-day. They are cordially hospitable to their American friends; the utterances of their public men and the opinions of most of their great newspapers give every evidence of good will; sentiment and self-interest unite in seeking the most cordial relations with the United States; but, none the less, they can not but envy our financial and military security, contrasted with the financial difficulties that beset them at home and the military difficulties that beset them abroad.

"I think that three-quarters of the English men and women with whom we talked, including bankers, manufacturers, politicians, and journalists, asked if we believed that in the long run they would pull through. Secondly, they were eager to know if the ship subsidy bill would succeed or fail. When Germany was crushed the British at one and the same time closed the most important continental market for their goods and eliminated their most important commercial rival, only to find raised up across the Atlantic a more formidable rival, whose market was largely closed to them by a protective tariff. than this, the tremendous merchant tonnage built by the American Government for the prosecution of the war has made us, in point of the number of floating keels and their tonnage, a far, far more serious rival as a merchant carrier than Germany ever was if we keep our merchantmen at sea.

Thus they see that America has taken the place of Britain as the principal money market in the world; that it has outstripped Germany as Britain's competitor as a manufacturer of exports and the potential carrier of ocean freights; and that finally America's wealth and geographic security are such that it promises in a short time to become more formidable still.

This condition is aggravated by the collapse of the markets of continental Europe, and English bankers, traders, and politicians, who move with a unity of purpose which has not been achieved in America, are eagerly seeking markets outside of Europe—in South America and in Asia—and look forward with some apprehension to an era of bitter competition with the United States

"They have not wholly appreciated, I think, that the promised commercial rivalry between the two countries wears no military aspect like that which characterized the competition between the British and German Empires before the Great War. Our commercial aims abroad are not dominated and directed by the Government; nor are they carried forward for the purposes of governmental aggrandizement. The Washington conference made certain that we are not going to enter into a naval competition like that between the fleets of Britain and Germany in the crowded waters that wash their shores. will be no Agadir as a prelude to a Serajevo. They have not understood, I think, that it is incredible that our Government should seek any military-commercial concession like that of the Anatolian Railway secured by the Germans, or that of the Anglo-Persian Oil Co. which Winston Churchill secured in the Basra oil fields. None the less, I do not want to give the impression that the fear of impending friction may not itself engender friction. I remember that after spending some hours at the House of Commons one evening with some friends one of them told me that he feared that our tariff policy, our competition with them as carriers at sea and sellers of goods from Buenos Aires to Bombay and Shanghai would become so acute as to put a severe strain upon the political friendship between the two countries. It is not always easy immediately to recognize the other man's point of view.

'The present state of Europe, then, so depressed as to touch our prosperity, after all is due to no single cause, economic or political. Plainly it is attributable in great part to the waste of war, which can be made good only by years of toil and frugal living on the part of millions; it is attributable in part to the ruin of Russia, where more millions have died since the peace of Brest-Litovsk than ever were killed while Russia fought Germany; it is attributable in part to the Bal-kanization of Europe by the peace treaties, which added new boundaries, new governments, new armies, new customs borders, new traffic tariffs to the many which threatened peace and thwarted trade in Europe before the war; it is attributable in part to the ambitions and aborted policies of shortlived cabinets throughout Europe; to the planless purposes of inexperienced parliaments seeking to govern talented and dauntless peoples long denied self-government.
"The world seeks a remedy for its ills. Remedy by the league?

Remedy by conference?

"The members of the league have met in conference in Geneva. The governments of Europe met in conference at Genoa. The prime ministers have met in conference, political and economic, at San Remo, Cannes, Paris, Spa, Brussels, London, and Bou-Sometimes they have accomplished nothing; sometimes they have accomplished a little. They have not been willing to seek the realizable. They seek the impossible. As I heard a prime minister remark the other day, "One of the great powers has assiduously fished behind the net." Time and again they have been willing to do to-day that which to-day was no longer realizable, although it could have been done six months before.

"If the governments can not agree upon a sound and realizable program for the definite and final settlement of the total sum of reparations that Germany shall pay and can pay, if they can not agree among themselves and with bankers and investors upon a plan that will stabilize German currency, we may expect the franc and the lira to start down the declivity in pursuit of the mark, the crown, and the ruble.

"The terms of the new reparations settlement manifestly ought to include priority of payments for the reconstruction of the ruins of northern France and a moratorium to Germany several years, conditional upon an adequately secured bankers' loan to stabilize the mark, to balance the current German budget, and to contribute to French reconstruction this year; a plan devised upon these general bases is indispensable to the solvency and credit of the State in France and Germany, to the rehabilitation of industry in Germany, and so to the recovery of reparations by France. More important to the rehabilitation of Europe than any conference, than any agreement between statesmen and financiers can be, is the exorcism of the spirit of hate which animates governments and peoples. Unless the peoples are moved by a Christian will to peace and by Christian comity there can be no real peace in Europe."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I have a communication from Rev. Stanley Manning, director of young people's work of the Young People's Christian Union, protesting against the use of the franking privilege by Senators for circulating matter not directly part of the Senate's proceedings. For the information of Senators, I should like to have the letter printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Printing.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Printing and ordered to be printed in the RECORD,

as follows:

THE UNIVERSALIST CHURCH,
EXECUTIVE OFFICES,
Boston, Mass., February 15, 1923.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH, Washington, D. C.

Washington, D. C.

My Dear Sir: There has just come to my desk, under the frank of a Senator, a copy of an article reprinted in the Congressional Record of January S regarding the report of the Inter-Church World Movement Committee which investigated the steel strike and the recent book by Marshall Olds attempting to effect its influence.

Leaving aside entirely the truth or faisity of the report, or of Mr. Olds's book, or of this article, I wish to register a very emphatic protest against the use of Government funds in printing and distributing such articles, which form no integral part of the deliberations of Congress. It is, to my mind, distinctly unchical to print and distribute at public expense reprints of this sort which give only one side of controverted questions, unless at the same time equal publicity is given to a presentation of the other side. I know that it is a matter of "senatorial courtesy" to allow such printing by unanimous consent, but in that kind of courtesy there is too little regard for the rights, intellectual and financial, of the public. It is unfair to use public funds for the distribution of partisan pamphlets, as is done during political campaigns and as has been done in the present instance.

I trust you will use your influence to bring about a discontinuance of this custom, which is both intellectually unfair and financially a waste of public funds.

Very truly yours,

THIRTY-SECOND LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY,
Regular session.

House Joint Memorial No. 8.

o the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

To the honorable senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the joint assembly of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent that—
Whereas the United States Spruce Production Corporation is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Washington;
Whereas the United States Spruce Production Corporation acquired and purchased from the Blodgett Timber Co. in Lincoln County, Oreg., more than 13,000 acres of timberland prior to November 11, 1918, the title thereof passing to the Government in connection with its program for the production of airplane material during the late World War, thereby taking from the tax rolls of Lincoln County, Oreg., one-tenth of all of the assessable property in said county; and Whereas the said United States Spruce Production Corporation built and constructed a railroad from Yaquina Bay, Lincoln County, Oreg., south for a distance of 26 miles connecting said timberland, and at a cost of approximately $2,500,600; the title of said property being in the United States Spruce Production Corporation was not taxable by Lincoln County in the State of Oregon; and
Whereas said United States Spruce Production Corporation during 1918 built and constructed 15 miles of railroad commencing on the north shore of Yaquina Ray, running north 15 miles into the great spruce beits situated in the Siletz country in Lincoln County, oreg., at a cost of approximately $1,500,000, which property is nontaxable; and at a cost of approximately $1,500,000, which property is nontaxable; and

Whereas the United States Spruce Production Corporation purchased and acquired a large amount of real estate at Toledo, Oreg., and has constructed thereon one of the largest sawmills in Oregon, and has spent vast sums of money thereon; and

Whereas on December 17, 1920, the United States Spruce Production Corporation entered into a contract with the Pacific Spruce Corporation, a Delaware corporation, under which all of the interests of the United States Government were sold to the Pacific Spruce Corporation; under the terms of said contract of December 17, 1920, the title to said property is to remain fixed in the United States Spruce Production Corporation until complete performance and full payment of the purchase price has been made by the purchaser, the Pacific Spruce Corporation;

By virtue of the above transaction a vast amount of property has been removed from the tax rolls of Lincoln County, the effect of which has been the placing of an unjust and unreasonable tax levy against the said property in said county remaining subject to taxation; and Whereas it was reported that certain payments are being made by the Pacific Spruce Corporation under said contract of December 17, 1920, of the small annual payment of $50,000 per year; that said corporation has proceeded since the date of the contract purchased to sever the timber from the said lands and to market the lumber therefrom;

That the transfer of the title from the Government under the above contract is contributed to the contract of the contract is contributed to the contract of the contract of the contract is contributed to the contract of the contract of the contract is contributed to the contract the contract of the contract is contributed to the contract the contract is contributed to the contract the contract is contract to the contra to sever the timber from the said lands and to market the lumber therefrom;

That the transfer of the title from the Government under the above contract is contingent upon the full compliance with the terms thereof, which is said to be 10 years, sufficient time will be allowed for said completion and in which time the timber will all be removed and forever exempt from taxation, and Lincoln County will have lost thousands of dollars; and

Whereas it is inequitable, unfair, and unjust that said county and its municipality should suffer such depreciation in their tax value and consequent loss; and

Whereas Lincoln County has bonded itself in the sum of $1,000,000 for building and construction of the harber on Yaquina Bay in order that the timberlands aforesaid and other timberlands in the county may be piaced upon the markets of the world, her tax bundens are almost unbearable and the county is facing bankruptcy: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the joint assembly of the senate and house of representatives. That the Congress of the United States of America be, and the same is hereby, memorialized in order that any doubt of the right of the State of Oregon, Lincoln County, and its several municipalities to tax as other property all property which is owned by the United States Spruce Corporation, and also all other property which may have been sold by the United States Spruce Production Corporation under contract or otherwise, including improvements placed thereon, or that in lieu thereof Congress, in the event that the tax upon said property be determined to be illegal, appropriate funds from the National Treasury in a sum equivalent to the amount of such taxes from year to year.

careful consideration to Senate bill No. 4130.

Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring):

Whereas a bill raising the limit on Federal farm loans from $10,000 to $25,000 has been introduced in Congress, and which is now in the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Therefore we urge our delegation in Congress to do their utmost to secure speedy and favorable action by the committee, and thereafter its prompt passage by Congress, so that it may become the law before March 1, 1925, at which time there are many Federal farm loans to be closed exceeding $10,000 in amount.

That the passage of this bill will not in any manner impair the operation nor the credit of the Federal land bank, but will result in extending its scope of usefulness so that a larger number of borrowers can be reached.

That all loans are made on the basis of the security offered, and borrowers of large amounts often offer the best security, owing to their executive ability and industry in the management of farm operation.

That the Federal land bank is seriously hampered in its operation owing to the $10,000 limit; be it further

Mr. NORBECK presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of South Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

A concurrent resolution requesting and demanding modification and revision of the present Federal standards for grading grain.

Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring). That the Bureau of Markets of the United States Department of Agriculture, in the spring of 1917, promujated certain standards for grading wheat which revolutionized the secondary of the state of South Dakota and unsatisfactory in commercial transactions; and as subsequent attempts by the said Bureau of Markets to amend the original standards and inspection rules have not removed the features objectionable to the wheat producers of South Dakota and the rural shippers of grain, with the result that the present standards are regarded by the farmers of the Northwest as unfair and unreasonable; and

Whereas the grades so established do not meet with the approval of the grain growers and shippers of this State and are believed to confer an undue advantage to the buyers, with a consequent discrimination against the farmers, thereby causing heavy losses every year; and

Whereas the States of Minnesota, South Dakota, North Dakota, Montana, Idaho, and Washington, at a meeting held in Helena, Mont., March 16, 1918, by formal resolution proposed standards for grading spring wheat which were declared to be fair to all interests directly concerned; and

Whereas the South Dakota Farm Bureau Federation, the South Dakota Farmers Grain Dealers' Association, and other farm and grain organizationers grain bealers' Association, and other farm and grain organizationers of the Northwest having appeared before the Federal Department of Agriculture and the Committee on Agriculture of both Houses of Congress advocating and urging action favorable to the requests and needs of the farmers of South Dakota; and reduction of the present freight rates for grain and live stock.

Whereas the present freight rates for shipment of grains and live stock by the railroads are excessive and of such a nature as to render the prices received by producers of such commodities less than the cost of production; and

Whereas several efforts have been made by the railroad commissioners of the State of South Dakota to secure reductions that are necessary for the preservation of the great industry of agriculture in the State of South Dakota; and

Whereas the rates now in force are approximately 20 per cent higher than the rates in force prior to 1918; and

Whereas the prices of farm products to the producer in this State are approximately 20 per cent lower than the average prices received by such producers for such commodities during the 10-year period just preceding the year 1918: Be it

That it hereby, in behalf of the people of the State of South Dakota, requests and demands that the Congress of the United States, by appropriate legislation or otherwise, and the Interstate Commerce Commission and all other bodies of the Federal Government having in their power or discretion to modify, reduce, revise, or amend the present freight rates, perform such duties as to comply with the requests of the farmers of the State of South Dakota and the Northwest and thereby remove this menace to the prosperity and welfare of the agricultural interests of South Dakota and the Northwest; and be it further States, eliminating the exemption from taxation of Representatives; and

Whereas such exemption has provided an avenue of escape from taxation of billions of dollars invested in such securities, thus increasing to an unwarranted degree the burdens imposed upon other classes of property; and

Whereas if this plan of exemption from taxation is to be continued, the burden of taxation will fall most heavily upon productive capital and will relieve nonproductive capital from its fair share of taxation: Now, therefore, be it

Whereas South Dakota is almost wholly dependent upon agriculture and, consequently, the market for agricultural products is of prime importance in our affairs; and

Whereas water transportation will reduce the cost of the carriage of wheat to the seaboard no less than 7 cents per bushel, and proportionately upon other cereals, a saving that would add many millions to the market value of the products of our farms, to say nothing of the reduced cost of merchandise by reason of bringing the seaboard to the interior; and

Whereas the proposed Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway will bring South Dakota 2,000 miles nearer to the Atlantic and European markets and will result in substantial advantage to our markets and the consequent improvement to agricultural conditions and the general prosperity of the people: Therefore be it

Whereas, by an act of Congress dated April 28, 1916, the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Rallway Co. was authorized to construct a steel bridge across the Missouri River at Chamberlain, S. Dak., and permission granted to continue the use of a pontoon bridge for the transportation of freight and passengers across said river until the completion of said steel bridge; and

Whereas the right to construct said bridge was extended by act of Congress approved February 25, 1919, and by a further act of Congress approved December 21, 1921, which last-named act extends the time for the completion of said bridge to April 28, 1925; and
Whereas said Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. began the construction of and completed a portion of said bridge in the year 1918 but has wholly failed to do anything toward the completion thereof since the early part of 1919; and
Whereas the use of said pontoon bridge is believed to endanger the lives of the employees of said railroad operating trains thereon and the lives of the traveling public; and
Whereas serious and costly accidents and delays in transportation have already occurred, to wit:

Second. That during the spring of the year when the ice is going out and during the June rise and in the fall of the year and when the ice is forming or floating in said river it is impossible to operate the draw in said bridge, and by reason of that fact all passenger, mail, freight, and express traffic to points west of the Missourl River is greatly delayed, especially when said bridge is out or draw open, and the development of the country deterred, and the business interests of the people located between Chamberlain and Rapid City, 8. BUREAU OF COMMERCIAL ECONOMICS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to grant a charter to the Bureau of Commercial Economics, whose headquarters are at 1108 Sixteenth Street, Washington, D. C., which I ask be read by title.

The bill (S. 4633) to incorporate the Bureau of Commercial Economics and grant it a corporate form and powers under the laws of the United States, and to receive the assets of a State corporation of the same name and assume its liabilities, was read twice by its title.

Mr. OWEN. This wonderful altruistic bureau is a great pub-With the cooperation of many of the leading lic servant. nations of the world it has gradually put in free circulation over 60,000 reels of exceeding 60,000,000 feet of film, showing the cities and scenic beauties of many countries, their customs, their industries, and social habits; all kinds of manufacturing ses, vocational instruction, and all forms of life of man, beast, birds, and fishes from all parts of the world. These reels come to the bureau from all over the world for free distribution and go to schools, community centers, and localities without easy access to moving-picture theaters.

These pictures without money and without price are being shown all over the world by the bureau in every State in the United States, in every State of Europe, in South America, in Africa, in Asia, and the South Sea Islands.

They are teaching the people all over the world to understand and respect each other, perhaps to love each other when they do understand. All that is noble, all that is truly constructive, all that is ideal, whether in things of the spirit or the intercourse of nations or of man with man, is founded on kindliness, on human sympathy. Across the ages or across the continents and seas such sympathy is engendered when mind meets mind in mutual understanding and respect, an understanding based on the tangible, concrete facts of the enfoldment of life in its joys and sorrows, its defeats and triumphs, be it among the bushmen of Australia or among the enterprising people of the United States; and a respect born of the consciousness that the individual, the community, the Nation, and the congress of peoples is but seeking, each according to his environment, the happiness and progress of those within the scope of his vision, and striving for the unfoldment of soul. Contact of East and West, of the pharonic ages and the twentieth century is not impossible of accomplishment. Through the eye, the immediate gateway to the mind, the picture conveys, portrays the life of one nation to another, delineating with equal skill the motivating principle, the embodiment of the thought in the deed, and the resultant fact and its concomitants, in a language that all but the blind can read and comprehend.

To be effective in the fostering of human sympathy and understanding such pictures must have broad distribution, must be available equally in the remote mountains and jungles as in the crowded cities, in community houses as in the universities, and the price for viewing them must be within the reach of all. There is but one such price, and that is free; free as the picture that nature places for all to admire, to understand, from which to draw wisdom and experience.

Life is larger than the making of a profit, which in its legitimate place is desirable, and the amity of nations and peoples will be accomplished only when each truly understand himself, the other and the relation of each to the whole. Such is the work of the Bureau of Commercial Economics which has quietly and effectively been introducing nations to each other, in their work and in their play, in their home environment wherever their argosies may venture, in pursuit of trade or pleasure, through its motion pictures and lectures, sent all over the world free to the people.

FACTS TO REMEMBER ABOUT THE BUREAU OF COMMERCIAL ECONOMICS.

The Bureau of Commercial Economics is purely altruistic. It is not operated for profit and has no capital stock.

The bureau is a chartered association cooperating with many governments, institutions, manufacturers, producers and transportation lines of America and other countries, formed for the purpose of disseminating geographical, commercial, industrial, and vocational information by means of motion pictures.

The bureau's films are shown free of charge to the public.

This is an invariable rule.

Although international in scope, the bureau is designed to make better citizens by teaching men how to get more out of life

The bureau has the indorsement of the officials of the United States Government, including President Harding; of foreign governments, leading industries, railroads, churches, and nearly all of the American universities and social welfare organiza-

The efficiency and economical management of the bureau has been amply proven on numerous occasions to Government officials and others who investigated its work before lending their cooperation.

The work of the bureau is directed by officers elected by the trustees and is assisted by an advisory council composed of college presidents and men of international distinction in science and letters.

At different times I have called the attention of the Senate to this great work and its possibilities but, never, until now, have I had a full and complete knowledge of all the details of its operations as I now possess after a full and exhaustive study and investigation of the matter.

The Bureau of Commercial Economics is the living story of one man's gratitude one of the most inspiring tales of self-sacrifice in the history of education.

In 1893 Mr. Francis Holley, after a life of great activity and success, found himself totally blind. Then began a fight that was to last through several years of night, during which time Mr. Holley was to resolve again and again that if ever his sight was returned he would show his gratitude by devoting his life to the service of mankind.

In that vow, made in the darkness when even the light of hope was burning low, lay the beginnings of the Bureau of Commercial Economics.

Mr. Holley was in Aix-la-Chappelle taking treatment for his eyes when he discovered a way in which to make his vow effec-The German Government at that time was holding in Dusseldorf its biennial exhibition of the various manufacturers represented in the German Empire. Not only was it an exhibition but it also was a vocational guide to the youth of Germany. German boys who could show high school certificates were sent to the exhibition from all parts of the Empire, and had their expenses at Dusseldorf paid by the Government for two weeks. The boys were allowed to inspect and study all the different crafts exhibited, and after this were expected to decide which vocation in life appealed to them most.

This, of course, was a much more intelligent way of picking one's life work than merely being pushed into any kind of work by the driving force of circumstances. But even so, Mr. Holley had a better way. If the exhibition were successful, would it not be even more successful if taken to the homes of the boys by means of motion pictures? He laid his idea before the German minister of education and before the Kaiser himself. Both were enthusiastic over the plan, and told him to go ahead. He did; and despite the inadequacy of motion pictures in those early days he met with considerable success. Failure to get suitable pictures of several important industries, however, led to temporary defeat.

But the feasibility of the plan had been proven. Success waited only on the perfection of the motion-picture camera and projection machine.

The rapid development of both gave him an opportunity sooner than he had looked for, and 10 years ago he began to organize the bureau of commercial economics with Miss Anita Maris Boggs, whose high ideals, broad conception of world affairs, and expert economic training and organization ability have contributed to its present world-wide usefulness and influence.

Now, what is this bureau of commercial economics? This can best be explained by a brief outline of its operations and purposes.

As soon as the bureau had been incorporated and had opened an office in Washington Mr. Holley started to put the idea into operation. He first went to the Bureau of Education of the Interior Department and told them he wanted all the motion pictures they could give him. He said he wanted to show them to the people, to make better citizens of them.

The Government officials, especially the late Secretary, Franklin K. Lane, were enthusiastic and promised their heartiest help. Then he went to the largest industrial concerns and begged the privilege of getting motion pictures of their plants. The purpose was to show the people how things in common use were made. He went to the foreign embassies in Washington and from them got films showing industries and customs in foreign lands.

Then came the question where to show these pictures. With boundless optimism and energy the universities and colleges, State granges, social settlement houses, community centers, and churches from one end of the country to the other were canvassed and agreed to show the pictures.

In all this work he laid down only two conditions: To the industries and Governments he stipulated that no picture should contain advertising. To the universities and other institutions he stipulated that the pictures must be shown free of charge to everybody.

The growth of the bureau was amazing. Nearly every university in the country was soon showing the bureau's pictures in its extension work. Dignitaries of the church got behind it; public officials went to its aid, and in a little while Mr. Holley's motion-picture programs, carrying their message of education and Americanism, were in circulation from Maine to California.

But to show them in buildings was to show them only in populated communities. This was not enough; there were backwaters of American life where buildings were not available. So Mr. Holley had special trucks made by which the bureau's films could be carried off the beaten paths of civilization and shown in the open air to men and women whose vision on life had been hemmed in by poverty and loneliness. Into the mountains of Tennessee and Kentucky, far out on the prairies of the Dakotas, in the negro settlements of the South, down into the teeming streets of New York's East Side the bureau's trucks, equipped with powerful projectors, rumbled their way, stopping frequently to put on a show out under the stars for the enlightenment of men.

So successful was the work of the bureau that Mr. Holley soon cast about to make the scope of the pictures take in the whole world. Through the State Department at Washington it was arranged to have the films sent free of charge through the American diplomatic pouches. Then with the cooperation of foreign Governments the bureau's message of education and patriotism began to march around the globe.

The infant mortality rate in India was soaring. Immediately several prints of a picture teaching the proper care of infants were on their way to India to be shown before crowds of amazed native mothers, and the films accomplished their purpose.

In the lonely steppes of Sberia the bureau's films are shown nightly on screens slung between telegraph poles of the Eastern Chinese & Siberian Railroad. At the mouth of the copper mines in Chile and Peru the bureau's pictures are teaching the peons the lesson of decent living and honest craftsmanship. The natives of Zululand, huddled in black, wondering groups about a white screen, learn how to make butter by modern Vermont methods. The weavers of Manchester, England, are shown the methods in use in the woolen mills of Manchester, N. H.

And the bureau's pictures are shown in theaters, too, but not for profit. Through an arrangement with the motion-picture theater owners of the United States, the bureau's pictures are exhibited at special matinee performances to children, free of charge.

The lesson of decent living and true Americanism is written in shadows and light before the inmates of State prisons. The bureau's pictures, speaking the simplest and most understandable of all languages, carry solace and reason into the warped minds of insane asylums. To patients in hospitals, seeking relief from pain, the bureau's films come with their message of cheer and hope.

In a word, wherever instruction and entertainment can advance the cause of civilization the bureau's pictures are knitting the races of man closer together.

The brotherhood of man is a big term, even if loosely used. But surely the bureau has caught hold of something that is every day bringing this brotherhood a little nearer to reality. The language of pictures is the language of men of all races. They have the same meaning on the Bund in Shanghai that they have on Broadway. And by showing the man of Shanghai how the man of New York lives, how he works, how he plays, you are destroying distance and making these two men neighbors—just two human beings seeking peace and happiness.

But just as it is bringing the races of man closer together through understanding, so is the bureau's work making better citizens of them. The ignorant mountaineer of Tennessee is a better American citizen if he is taught how to market his crops more scientifically. The French peasant is a better Frenchman if he improves his mode of living by learning through pictures the lessons of sanitation. Your prisoner in Sing Sing will be less of a liability after his release if pictures have taught him a trade in prison.

So these are the purposes and the work of the bureau: To make better citizens of men and women, to bring the races of men closer together through understanding, and to lift the plane of living just a little bit higher among the people down near the bottom of the ladder.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I introduce a joint resolution, and ask to have it read and lie on the table.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LENROOT submitted an amendment providing that the appropriation of $40,000 for the fiscal year 1923 for the establishment of a fish-rescue station on the Mississ'ppi River, made by the deficiency appropriation act approved July 1, 1922, be continued and made available during the fiscal year 1924, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 14408, the third deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and order to be printed.

and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBINSON submitted an amendment proposing to pay $900 to Leslie L. Biffle for services rendered to various committees of the Senate in addition to his regular duties, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 14408, the third deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES I. O'NEILL.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 450), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Charles I. O'Neill, the sum of $500 for expert services rendered by him to the Senate Committee on Finance during the Sixty-seventh Congress in compiling, editing, and indexing hearings, special reports, and bills relating to the revenue act of 1921, and the tariff act of 1922.

FEDERAL AND STATE DEBTS.

Mr. NORRIS. I offer a Senate resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read,

The resolution (S. Res. 451) was read, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 451) was read, as follows:

Whereas the public debts of the United States and of the several States and their political subdivisions, many of which are exempt from taxation, have reached enormous proportions of the total wealth of the country; and

Whereas many of the agricultural, manufacturing, and other industries, or trades, of the country are suffering from heavy indebtedness and from burdensome taxation; and

Whereas the situation as to international debts in relation to the revival of preductive enterprise throughout the world presents a problem of great complexity, and a general accounting with regard to the economic position of this country is necessary in order to formulate an intelligent policy: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to make an inquiry into, and to compile data concerning, the total amount of the chief kinds of wealth in the United States, including land, improvements, movables, and other tangible and intangible goods, and also the ownership thereof, and the various liabilities incumbent thereon, including public and private debts, of various kinds, corporation stocks and other choses in action, and to make inquiry into, and compile data concerning, the amount of the annual increase in national wealth in recent years in different lines of economic activity and of the income received by different classes of the population, including data as to the amount of the income from securities exempt from taxation under the Federal income and profits taxes; and to make report on the aforesaid matters, as soon as practicable; Provided, however, That in respect to such data no information shall be reported or published which would reveal the amount of wealth, property, indebtedness, or income of any person, partnership, or corporation. And be it further

Resolved, That in accordance with section 8 of an act approved September 26, 1914, entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President-

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Illinois. Mr. McCORMICK. I sought to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether the resolution contains a request that the commission prepare a comparison of expenditures and taxes by States and local taxing bodies to-day and, say, five years ago?

Mr. NORRIS. No, Mr. President; that is not included. Mr. McCORMICK. Would the Senator object to the addition of such a provision?

Mr. NORRIS. I would not. I think that would be of a great deal of value. Then, if the information is secured that the resolution calls for, it will be very easy to make a comparison. I should have no objection to having it amended in

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, it has been stated that the annual sum of State and local taxation amounts to some five billions a year, or more than is now collected by the National Government. Many of us know from personal knowledge that within our own States the cost of State government or municipal government has trebled and quadrupled with a four years. Relief from taxation by Congress will not lighten the burden of the people unless the States and local taxing bodies desist from the vast expenditures in which they are now engaged. If the Senator will permit me, I will draft a brief amendment covering the matter I have suggested, and send it to the desk

Mr. NORRIS. I will say that I shall have no objection to that kind of an amendment. It will add just a little work to the Federal Trade Commission, but I can see that it would be very valuable.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will ask that the resolution go over for the day. Then the Senator from Illinois can prepare his amendment more carefully.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over for one day.

IMPURITIES AND MISGRADING IN ANTHRACITE COAL.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I offer a Senate resolution requesting certain information on the subject of coal impurities, and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read. The resolution (S. Res. 452) was read, as follows:

The resolution (S. Res. 452) was read, as follows:

Whereas there is general complaint of the marketing to the public of anthracite coal of misgraded sizes and containing a large proportion of impurities; and

Whereas the purchasers of anthracite coal are entitled to know what sizes they are buying and to what extent they are obliged to pay for slate, slag, and other fuelless material; and

Whereas the Bureau of Mines has inspected coal for purchase by the Government for a number of years, and through the Government fuel yards purchases coal for the Government buildings in the District of Columbia, and has carried on extensive studies of the quality and size of market grades of coal: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Bureau of Mines is directed to report to the Senate (1) the result of such studies, particularly giving such information as would indicate the extent to which impurities and misgrading have been found in domestic sizes of anthracite coal; (2) what information that bureau has as to the extent to which impure or misgraded anthracite coal of domestic sizes has been generally marketed to the public; and (3) whether or not it is the opinion of the bureau that legislation should be adopted seeking to establish market grades as to the size and quality of anthracite coal shipped in interstate commerce.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I simply wish to point out to the Senator from Massachuset: that those provisions were included in a bill which I introduced, and which is now on the calendar, not only to study the cost of production and distribution of coal but also to make a survey and provide for the classification of coal, placing the authority for the enforcement of the sale of coal under proper classification with the Department of the Interior. I think this resolution does not go far enough, although it would provide very valuable information on the subject. I heartily approve of the resolution, but I hope some future Congress will pass a fact finding bill such as the one that I proposed and that is now in the morgue of the Senate Calendar.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, Mr. President, I am in hearty sympathy with the bill introduced by the Senator from New Jersey. I think it should have been passed by Congress long ago. This resolution, however, does not seek to make legislation. It simply seeks information, and information which would have been available had the Senator's bill been passed. The information sought may help to get some legislation on this subject of fireless coal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSENGER TO FINANCE COMMITTEE.

Mr. SMOOT submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 453), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger at the rate of $1,200 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate during the Sixty-eighth Congress.

PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer a resolution which I ask to have read and lie upon the table until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 454) was read, as follows:

The resolution (S. Res. 454) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate approve of the adherence by the United States to the protocol of December 16, 1920, accepting the adjoining statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice, excepting therefrom the optional clause for compulsory jurisdiction; said adherence to be made upon the following conditions and understandings, to be made a part of the act of adherence;

(1) That such adherence shall not be taken to involve any legal relation on the part of the United States to the League of Nations or the assumption of any obligations by the United States under the covenant of the League of Nations constituting part of the treaty of Versailles.

(2) That the United States shall be assumption.

(2) That the United States shall be permitted to participate through representatives designated for the purpose and upon an equality with the other States members, respectively, of the council and assembly of the League of Nations, in any and all proceedings of either the council or the assembly for the election of judges or deputy judges of the Permanent Court of International Justice or for the filling of

(3) That the United States will pay a fair share of the expenses of the court as determined and appropriated from time to time by the Congress of the United States.

(4) That the statute for the Permanent Court of International Justice adjoined to the protocol shall not be amended without the consent of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

FACTS REGARDING EXPORTS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. McCORMICK submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 455), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Rela-

Resolved, That the President be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint a commission of five persons to ascertain the facts regarding the present distribution, volume, and value of the agricultural and manufactured exports of the United States and the commercial problems related thereto, and that he is requested and authorized to assign to the service of the commission such officers and employees of the Department of State, the Treasury, Agriculture, and Commerce as he may deem necessary to the performance of the duties of the commission. The commission shall report not later than November 1, 1925.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the American Economist discussing Government operation of ships for a limited period.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

[From American Economist of February 23, 1923.]

FLETCHER'S SPEECH FAVORING GOVERNMENT OPERATION OF SHIPS.

From American Economist of February 23, 1923.]

Senator Fletcher's Spech Favoring Government Operation of Shiffs.

Senator Dungan U. Fletcher, of Florida, ranking Democratic member of the Senate Commerce Committee and formerly chairman of that committee, made a notable speech in the Senate recently on the pending ship subsidy bill, in which he undertook, with considerable success, to brush aside a number of errors that have crept into the discussion of that historical shipping bill and which have tended to obscure the facts. Senator Fletcher used as his text certain expressions made by President Harding when he delivered his message a short time ago on the British debt funding bill to the Congress in joint session, at which time the President made some rather pointed references to the ship subsidy bill in an effort to secure action on it and the Senate, in which body the bill is still pending. Senator Fletcher, has, for the past six or seven years, developed a stronger and stronger has in favor of Government operation of the ships it opinishes, ships to private owners. He has felt, and frequently said, that Government ownership has not had such a test of Government operation of dealing with that vast tonnage. Senator Fletcher's speech closely followed one delivered by Senator W. L. Jones, which was in part reviewed in the last issue of the American Economist.

The statement is made in the press," said Senator Fletcher's speech closely followed one delivered by Senator W. L. Jones, which was in part reviewed in the last issue of the American Economist.

The statement is made in the press," said Senator Fletcher in an effort to prevent a vote being taken on the bill. I do not feel called upon to consider the circumstances in which a fill-buster would be justified in eligible to the president to Congress on the 7th of this month that those opposed to the pending bill have been employing obstructive tactics, wasting time, and engaging in what is commonly called a not feel called upon to consider the circumstances i

There can be no doubt whatever that the President stands on sirn ground in claiming that the public has a right to expect "deciring action" on important legislative matters; but Senator Flexchen on important legislative matters; but Senator Flexchen on important legislative matters; but Senator Flexchen on the continued Senator Flexchen, "that there is no Government operation of the ships except in the case of one line that is of recent establishment, the United States Line, in charge of Mr. Robsottom, and except of the Government, of course, from the beginning and long before we were had ships built by the Government. These are the only two instances of Government operation." This is technically correct, that they are allocated by the Shippping Beard, which bears all of the losses of operation and pays the private operators a percentage on the money carried with the Shipping Board is losing $50,000,000 a year through its coperation of ships, and this loss is emphasized in order to discredit Government operation and to emphasize the need of the ships being turned over to private operators at the carliest moment pressible, the losses of the Shipping Board only total about $3,000,000 a month, wherefore he declares that, inexcensible as they are, they 'do not approach the figures which have been given to the President, and chides the President night have been given to the President, and chides the President shipt have he mind when he goes to scold Connection and errors of fact, but raps him rather sharply when he said: "The President speath have him which he has refused to do not him to do by express enactment, which he has refused to do not him to do by express enactment, which he has refused to deen the searcely warranted, I think, in holding up to the country the eventual stream of the country the country free to adopt the early, successful American policy of discriminating import duties and tonus with which what he was trade treatless country free to adopt the early, successful American policy of the present t providing should be done.

Senator FLETCHER's speech covers more than a score of pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, all of it in small type, and much of it in extremely small type, being in the latter case copious quotations from speeches, acts of Congress, and communications he has received from those interested in pending legislation.

As sustaining the Senator's position that Government operation of merchant ships have never had a fair test, he quotes at length from a communication from one Nelson Collins, who spiritedly describes at great length and in much detail the operation of Government ships by the Government while the war was on, only a brief extract from which we have space to reproduce. Mr. Collins described the "New York office" of the United States Shipping Board, "that actually ran all the ships—165 of them at the maximum—that the Government held in one great civilian fleet throughout the war." "Lest we forget," as we are so liable to do with so much crowding into the events of the World War, and our own participation in it, the following, descriptive of our Government's war-time activities in the operation of merchant ships, is de-liable to do with so much crowding into the events of the World War, and our own participation in it, the following, descriptive of our Government's war-time activities in the operation of merchant ships, is descripting of space:

"The ships of 'the New York office' were on the runs to France and England and Italy and Russia; went coastwise to Atlantic South America; ran down to Cuba and Porto Rice; carried coal from Newport News to New England. Its ships carried 20 per cent of all supplies taken to Europe under the United States flag for both our own armies and the allies. The office devised and executed its own repair system for both the incidental voyage repairs and the semiannual general overhaul. It had its own legal bureau. It maintained a system of guarding its ships in port under W. H. Moore that kept the fleet throughout the war without a single serious fire or theft. Its commissary operated in 1918 at 86 cents per man per day, with satisfied crews and a variety and value in its food that led to many inquiries from private companies. It handled its own manning problems, and its shipping office at No. 5 Greenwich Street, under John J. Daly, never failed to keep the ships supplied with crews, in regular routine or emergency call. This shipping office was used as the basis of the Government's shipping-office system when the Shipping Board reorganized its operations in a peacetime program. It established a complete system of medical inspection and treatment under Dr. W. H. Meiners."

Capt. Charles Yates, inexperienced in the handling of a large fleet of ocean-going ships, in which quick turn around was a prime essential, a man of unusual executive ability, nevertheless, developed and handled this vast fleet, which began in May, 1917, a month after our declaration of war, with six ships of but 28,523 tons, a fleet that in a year grew to 128 ships with a dead-weight tonnage of 810,552. "It was the greatest fleet of merchant ships that ever has been gathered into one operating unit," said Mr. Collins, "beside operating.

We feel sure that Senator Duncan U. Fletcher will be pleased to send a complete copy of his speech, from which we have quoted, to anyone asking for it, and no friend of American shipping can afford to omit a careful reading of this speech, which clears up so many points that are obscure in the ownership and operation of Government ships in foreign trade.

MONTHLY REPORTS OF CONDITION OF RAILROAD EQUIPMENT.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the morning business has been disposed of to the point where it is permissible for me to do so, I wish to call up Senate Resolution 438, which is lying on the table, and ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read. The reading clerk read Segate Resolution 438, submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE on the 12th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it is hereby, requested to report to the Congress, and when Congress is not in session, to the President, as soon as possible after the first day of each month the condition of railroad equipment as revealed by the reports of the carriers and by the inspections of the commission, the number of persons killed, the number of injured upon the railroads, and any other available data bearing upon the physical condition of the railroads, and of railroad equipment, together with a statement of what action, if any, has been taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission within its statutory power to remedy the situation.

Resolved further, That such monthly reports as soon as transmitted to the President or to the Congress shall be available to the public.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am reluctant to take up the time of the Senate discussing this resolution unless it is in the Record, as follows:

desired on the part of Senators that it should be explained. think manifestly, upon its face, it ought to be passed at once by I am aware of the fact that many Senators desire to have consideration of bills during the morning hour, and I will not enter upon a discussion of the resolution unless some one wants to have it explained.

Mr. WATSON. May I see it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is a resolution calling upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to furnish information to the Senate from time to time with regard to the equipment of the railroads; in short, to report once each month, and when the Congress is not in session to report to the President, and that such reports shall be open to public inspection. I can set forth in the discussion I am prepared to make upon this resolution the reasons for it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Did I understand the Senator to say he wants a report every month?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The first of every month.

Mr. TOWNSEND. How much work will that require?
Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It will impose but very little work upon the commission, I am advised. I believe it is very important that such reports be made each month, because the increase in the number of locomotives and of cars that are out of repair month by month is very startling. More people are being killed and injured upon the railroads in 30 days now than were killed and injured for the six months' period preceding, and it is increasing very rapidly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the commission now get this information?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The commission obtains the information under authority of law, and they have authority of law for requiring that the improvements and repairs be made. I am asking in this resolution that they report to Congress monthly when it is in session, and to the President when Con-gress is not in session, with regard to the condition of the equipment, with reference to the persons injured or killed, and what the Interstate Commerce Commission is doing, if anything, under existing law, to bring about the repair of the equipment.

I ask leave to incorporate as a part of my remarks tables and statistics furnished by the Interstate Commerce Commission and data bearing upon this question.

Mr. WATSON. Has the Senator found out how many additional employees it will take to gather this information?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not asked that question, nor do I think it very important, because the data are collected, and by the terms of the resolution the commission will be required to compile and report monthly.

Mr. WATSON. They are constantly collecting information in regard to that matter, are they not?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. They are required to constantly collect this information and to make the inspections. It is a part of their duty.

Mr. WATSON. That was my understanding.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If there is any failure upon their part to do it, I am confident that the remissness is chargeable to Congress in not furnishing them with a sufficient appropriation to employ the necessary number of inspectors. This resolution will bring out all the facts, and I think a statement of the facts should be in the possession not only of the Congress and of the President but of the country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin for the insertion in the Record of certain tables and statistics?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed

ATTORNEYS EMPLOYED BY SHIPPING BOARD.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on the 16th of January I offered a resolution, which was adopted, asking the Shipping Board to submit various items of information. I am advised at the desk that no response has been made to that resolution. I want to give notice that if the information is not forthcoming by tomorrow I shall ask for the adoption of another resolution requesting immediate response by the Shipping Board to the resotion heretofore adopted by the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Is that a resolution the Senate passed calling upon the Shipping Board for certain information?

Mr. KING. It is.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, I do not know just how they are progressing in preparing the information, but I do know that Chairman Lasker told me some little time ago that they were working on it just as expeditiously as possible; that it called for a tremendous amount of information, and that it would take them quite a little while to get it. I feel that there is no neglect on the part of the Shipping Board to furnish the information as soon as possible.

Mr. KING. I shall be under obligation to the Senator if he will ask Mr. Lasker to communicate with the Senator from Washington and myself in regard to it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KING. I yield. Mr. POMERENE. I wish to say in that connection, too, that some time ago I presented a resolution calling for details as to the facts regarding the sale of certain ships, the terms of the sale, and other matters relating to it. That resolution was answered, but later another resolution was presented calling for the same information and for a statement as to all ships sold prior to March 4, 1921. That resolution has not as yet been answered. Again, there was a third resolution calling upon the Shipping Board for information as to the probable cost of equipping these steel ships with Diesel engines. That is a matter of very great importance, I think, and the information would be of very great value to the Senate in determining what should be done with those ships.

I have been very anxious to have that information and I hope that we may be favored with a report on those two resolutions by the Shipping Board.

CAPT. NORMAN BANDOLPH.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to take from the calendar Order of Business No. 1203, House bill 14317, granting permission to Capt. Norman Randolph, United States Army, to accept the decoration of the Spanish Order of Military Merit of Alfonso XIII. It is a House bill, and its consideration will take but a moment. It carries no appro-

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the Senator's request? We could not hear one word that he said on account of the confusion in the Chamber.

Mr. LODGE. My request is that we take up House bill 14317. It is a bill simply to permit the acceptance of a deco-

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it on the calendar?

Mr. LODGE. It is on the calendar.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is there any precedent for it? Mr. LODGE, Yes; there are plenty of precedents. We passed a similar bill the other day.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I wanted to know. I am rather against such legislation.

Mr. LODGE. I am, too.

Mr. OVERMAN. If there are precedents for it I shall not object. Mr. LODGE. We passed a similar bill the other day. It is simply permitting a soldier to accept a decoration.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator advise us as to the particular public service for which the decoration is to be conferred? Mr. LODGE. It is stated in the House report. It is a House bill. I have not a copy of the report here.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, while we are waiting for the

Mr. LODGE. The House committee made a report on the bill. It is not on our files, and I have no desire to keep the Senate waiting any longer.

FRANK A. JAHN.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to call up Order of Business 1138, Senate bill 4152, for the relief of Frank A. Jahn, upon which there is a report on file. The passage of the bill is recommended by the Secretary of the Navy and the Assistant Secretary of the Navy. It simply puts a man upon the retired list who passed the requisite examination, but concerning whose request for the taking of the examination there was some question at one time. There is no more than that in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to object to the consideration of this bill, but I hope that after it is passed we may be permitted to go to the calendar instead of calling up bills by unanimous consent.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized to appoint Frank A. Jahn a lieutenant (junior grade) in the United States Navy and to retire him and place him upon the retired list of the Navy with the retired pay and allowances of that grade.

Mr. KING. Is this a bill the Senator from California introduced'

Mr. JOHNSON. It is.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator from California whether this man was a reserve officer or one who had a regular naval status.

Mr. JOHNSON. He served for 13 years in the Navy, was incapacitated in the service, was retired, his disability having been determined by a board regularly called together, and then upon a technical question as to whether the request for examination had been made by him in proper form the order retiring him was revoked; and now both the Secretary of the Navy and the Assistant Secretary of the Navy say this bill should be passed, in justice to him, because of his incapacity.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed, and under the unanimous-consent agreement the calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. KING. Where do we commence on the calendar?

The VICE PRESIDENT. With the first number on the calendar.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate Joint Resolution 278, which is a very important joint resolution. It affects a land office in my State, and a report was filed on Saturday.

Mr. BORAH. I do not see why we should not go to the calendar.

Mr. HARRELD. This is a joint resolution which I think is important. We will have to get the resolution through the House, and I would be very glad if we could give it present consideration.

Mr. BORAH. There are several bills we will have to get through the House. I shall not object to the consideration of this joint resolution, but I want it distinctly understood that this is the last one I shall consent to until we go to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the number of the Senator's joint resolution, and where is it?

Mr. HARRELD. It is Senate Joint Resolution 217. A favorable report was made on the joint resolution on Saturday by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Bursum].

Mr. SMOOT. What is the calendar number?
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that the joint resolution is on the calendar, Order of Business No. 1666. Mr. MOSES.

LIEUT, JOHN L. LIVINGSTON.

The bill (S. 2792) for the relief of John L. Livingston was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. I would like to ask the author of the bill when the disability occurred.

Mr. LODGE. That bill was quite fully discussed when it was last reached. It is a case which I think is singularly deserving. I listened to the debate on the bill in the Senate. officer received injuries to his back which made him a cripple for life, and the case was fully explained by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. DIAL. How long ago was it?

Mr. LODGE. I have not the date. Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.
Mr. KING. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. Nicholson] intended to offer a substitute for the bill to which no objection whatever could be made.

Mr. NEW. The Senator from Colorado is Ill in a hospital here, and it is evident that he will not be here to-day at least.

Mr. LODGE. No; he can not be here. Mr. NEW. If the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] will give me his attention, I will say that I have no special interest in the bill, but I recall very well that the Senator from Colorado in explaining it said that the accident happened a few days after the armistice was signed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. NEW. I have not the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Utah. Mr. KING. Mr. President, this bill was before the Senate a few days ago, and there was some objection based upon the ground that it was in contravention of the policy announced after due deliberation upon the part of Congress of denying to reserve or temporary officers the benefits and privileges of retirement provided by law for regular officers of the Navy. was a unanimous feeling favoring adequate relief and most generous compensation for the beneficiary named in the bill. Objection to the bill was not the result of any opposition to granting a liberal pension or liberal compensation to the injured person. I understood that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Nicholson], who introduced the bill, would submit a substitute which would meet this objection and provide in a just way for the person named in the bill. The Senator is absent to-day, and in his absence I suggest that the bill be passed. It can be taken up upon his coming into the Chamber.

Mr. LODGE. The Senate is not acting alone on unobjected bills. Therefore I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill. I think it would be very cruel action not

The motion was agreed to: and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That John L. Livingston, who while serving as a lieutenant, United States Naval Reserve Force, was found by a naval retiring board to be permanently incapacitated for active service by reason of physical disability incurred in the line of duty as the result of an incident of the service, but not in time of war, shall be eligible for retirement as if his physical disability was incurred in time of war; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to place him upon the retired list with three-quarters pay of the grade held by him at the time such physical disability was incurred.

Was it a unanimous report from the committee? Mr. LODGE. It was. It was one of the most deserving cases that ever came to the notice of the committee.

Mr. KING. There is no objection to compensating this man, and perhaps he should have been given all the retirement privileges. But I want to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact, as I understand the facts in the case, that we are establishing a precedent that reserve officers who have been separated from the service are to have the benefits of retirement the same as regular officers of the Navy.

Mr. LODGE. The man was in the service when the accident occurred. I shall not read the whole of the report, but just a sentence or two from the medical report. There was a fracture of the fourth lumbar vertebra. Further along in the medical report it is said:

There is a definite tendency toward improvement in the function of the limbs, but progress is slow, and the restoration of power will probably only be effected up to a certain degree. The ultimate chances of complete recovery are not favorable. At present the patient can stand on the right leg and assist himself a short distance about the bed. The outlook for complete recovery is doubtful. Probable condition: Unfit for service. Probable future duration: Permanent.

Recommendation: That he be ordered before United States Naval Retiring Board for retirement.

His disability was 100 per cent for naval service and 100 per cent for civil occupation. The injury was incurred subsequent to his enrollment as lieutenant in the Naval Reserve Corps, class 5, general service. It happened in March, 1921. He was humanity that the bill be passed in his interest.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.
Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask if he can prompt us as to the date that was fixed as to the upset date after which time Naval Reserve officers should not be placed upon the retired

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I can answer the Senator's question. It was March 3, 1921, and the date of filling applica-tions October 1, 1921. I rose for the purpose of saying that this is a very deserving case, but there ought to be general legislation to cover similar cases. I know of at least four cases among naval reserve aviation officers similar to this, none more worthy than this, and I am not going to oppose the passage of the bill. There is in the District here a young man badly injured, whose throat has been paralyzed, who can not speak above a whisper, who can not distinguish between different foods, who has a wife and two children, and who has not the benefits of the retirement provisions of the law because he was permanently injured after March 3, 1921.

The Naval Committee ought to have introduced a general bill giving all the reserve officers who have been permanently incapacitated an opportunity to come within the provisions of the law. Its provisions should be extended from March 3, 1921, to July 1, 1922. All naval reserve officers were retired in July last. A general law ought to be enacted extending the law to cover that period of time between March 3, 1921, and July 1,

I do want to say, however, that the Livingston case is a very deserving one, and I am making no objection to it at all. think it is a bill that ought to be enacted into law at once.

Mr. LODGE. He was injured within the time. Mr. WADSWORTH. Why was he not retired?

Mr. LODGE. Because he was not within the time covered by the provisions of the law, and we are trying to bring him within that provision.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I ask if it is not true that he was in the service after October 1, 1921, and that is why he has not been retired?

Mr. LODGE. The Secretary of the Navy advised the President that the act of July 12, 1921, governing the retirement of officers of the Naval Reserve Force and temporary officers of the Navy limited such retirements to those who had incurred I physical disability in time of war, and as Lieutenant Livingston did not incur his physical disability in time of war he was not eligible for retirement. The President on October 29, 1921, approved the proceedings and findings of a naval retiring board and directed that Lieutenant Livingston be not placed on the retired list. The Secretary of the Navy recommends the passage of the bill.

WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am not going to oppose the bill, but it is perfectly apparent to any Senator who understands the history of legislation, especially so-called private legislation, that only the former reserve officers of the Navy who have pull enough, influence enough, to get a favorable report from the Committee on Naval Affairs will get the retirement privileges. Others will not. We either should pass all these special private bills without any limitation whatsoever or pass none of them and enact general legislation instead. There are several bills on the calendar involving individual cases, probably all of them worthy, but it is a most unscientific and in the end will be a most unfair way of proceeding to take up individual cases and special bills and pass them, with some men having good luck and other men having bad luck.

regret exceedingly that the Committee on Naval Affairs, if it proposes to treat these men in this way, has not reported general provision taking care of them. The Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate has reported such a provision. Personally I thought it was a mistake. I opposed it. committee reported it and the Senate passed it. The House Committee on Military Affairs has refused to report the bill. That is the emergency officers' retirement bill. Now we are proceeding to do by piecemeal the very thing which ought not to be done by piecemeal. Either the policy is good or bad, and ought to be established or rejected as a pelicy.

Mr. LODGE. As far as "influence" or "pull," to which the Senater has referred, I never heard of Mr. Livingston until the bill was brought before the Senate. I am not able to attend the meetings of the Naval Affairs Committee as constantly as I should like to do, and I never heard of this case until it was taken up and discussed on the floor of the Senate. I do not know who Lieutenant Livingston is. I do not know where he comes from. So far as I am concerned, I am taking the case simply as a matter of humanity. I do not see why this man, whose case is like the case stated by my colleague, should be deprived of relief because Congress has not passed general legislation. A man with a broken back, who is lying in bed helpless and can do nothing for himself, who has been announced as permanently injured, appeals for help; and yet we are told that we must not relieve him because the proper laws of a general character have not been enacted. I think the only way to get by the deficiencies of congressional action is to pass this bill, which involves such a deserving case.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The trouble is that Congress repealed the general law only one year ago.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator means that they are in that way deprived of relief?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was only last year that we repealed the law.

Mr. LODGE. If that happened only a year ago, I call attention to the fact that this man was injured before that was done. Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true; but, as the Senator said, he was injured after the war was over and did not fall under the general provisions of the law. This particular case did not fall within the general provisions of the law. Then the Congress even repealed the general provision. We either ought to reenact the general provision and extend it to take care of these cases, or else we ought not to make exceptions. Mr. LODGE. He had been in the Navy for some time, and he was injured on the 14th of March, 1921, which was much more than a year ago. The law to which the Senator referred had not been repealed at that time.

Mr. LENROOT. Does he receive any compensation of any kind now?

Mr. LODGE. None of any kind. This is an effort to retire

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, is not this an especial case? Here is a report from the Secretary of the Navy which says that the injury was incurred in line of duty as a result of an incident of the service-

Mr. LODGE. I have read that. I know it is a special case, and I have been trying to make it clear to the Senate why I think it ought to be made special. There was a statement made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Nicholson], who went into it very fully and the matter was discussed here. I think it is a deserving case. Until we get proper general legislation I believe in doing something for men who have been in the Navy during the war and rendered military service, and who, subsequent to the war, while still in the service and acting under orders, are injured.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. NEW. In answer to the question asked by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot] whether the man is in receipt of any compensation in any form, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. NICHOLSON] stated that he was not, but that he was living on the charity of friends. He has no compensation of any kind whatsoever.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President—
Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. I wish to say, as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, that the committee went into the details of this case very thoroughly. In reply to the Senator from New York, I wish to say that no one had any influence and no one had any "pull" with the committee. I am fully justified in saying that no one had any influence and the case was dealt with on its merits.

Further, I wish to say that in dealing with cases of injuries which are so apparent as in this case, it is a small part for the Senate to refuse relief because of the fact that some committee has been negligent in reporting general legislation. There is no excuse for a human being who, in the service of his country, was injured as this man was injured, being refused relief by the Senate of the United States. I think the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Page] will verify what I have said, and I hope the Senate will not go on record as refusing to grant proper relief to the soldiers and sailors of the country.

Mr. PAGE. The Senator did not state that there was an absolutely unanimous report from the committee.

Mr. COUZENS. That is true. Mr. PAGE, We found there were only 11 days between the time the man was injured and the time when he otherwise would have been retired without any question. I have a long letter from the Secretary of the Navy, and here is his closing para-

From the above it would seem that had the disability in this case been incurred 11 days sooner, Lieutenant Livingston would have been eligible to retirement under the law. This department regards this case as a meritorious one and is of the opinion that the bill should be enacted into law for his relief. This proposed legislation has been submitted to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, and the director advises that this request for legislation is not in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, this is a very deserving case, and I hope the bill will be passed. I have risen at this time, however, for the purpose of asking the Committee on Naval Affairs to extend the same treatment to all reserve officers of the Navy who are now suffering from permanent disabilities incurred while in the service of their country. The fact is that up to a given period of time every reserve officer who became permanently incapacitated in the service could be retired with pay in the same manner as regular naval official termination of the war, which was March 3, 1921. Navy Department held many reserve officers in the service after that date; indeed, until July 1, 1922. This particular individual for whose benefit this bill has been reported by the Naval Affairs Committee was a reserve naval officer and was injured a few days after the time when the war was officially terminated. In all fairness he is entitled to the same benefits extended to those reserve officers permanently injured prior to March 3, 1921, and he ought to be retired with pay just as he would were he a regular naval officer. But there are other reserves in the same situation, others who have become permanently disabled since March 3, 1921. They all should be given retirement benefits just as if they were regular officers.

I ask the Naval Affairs Committee to report a bill to extend the time for giving the retirement benefits to reserve officers to July 1, 1922, when all naval reserve officers were displaced. There are no reserve officers in active service now. Therefore the benefits of the general law which reserve officers who were injured prior to March 3, 1921, enjoy should be extended to those injured in the interim from March 3, 1921, to July 1, Why should not reserve officers injured between March 3. 1921, and July 1, 1922, after the time expired for coming within the general provision of the law, be given the benefits enjoyed by their brother officers who were unfortunate enough to be injured before March 3, 1921? It seems to me that a general bill ought to be reported taking care of all the deserving cases of naval reserve officers permanently injured and found by the retirement board to be permanently incapacitated while in the service of their country. Let us make no distinction between naval reserve officers permanently injured between November 11, 1918—Armistice Day—and March 3, 1921, and those injured between March 3, 1921, and July 1, 1922, when all naval reserve officers were retired from active service.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it is a very unpleasant task to criticize the pending bill, because the serious injuries sustained by a brave soldier are such as to provoke sympathy and to require that generous relief be promptly awarded him. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing a proposition to grant to the injured person a pension or just and fair compensation for the injuries which he has sustained. I am merely opposing the manner by which it is proposed that he shall obtain re-The Senator from Michigan [Mr. Couzens] indicated that the Senate ought not to oppose this bill or go on record in opposition to granting relief to soldiers and sailors injured in the line of duty. I most heartly agree with the Senator to the effect that we should not oppose measures that bestow suitable pensions or compensation upon those who have been so injured

Mr. President, I have uniformly contended that those who were injured in fighting the battles of their country, or incurred disabilities while in the military service of their country, should be generously treated by a grateful Nation, and I have further insisted that those who gave their lives upon the battle fields or in the service of their country should be gratefully remembered, and that their families and dependents should be granted liberal pensions by the Government.

But that is not the important and precise question before us. No one is suggesting that this injured soldier be denied relief. As I have heretofore stated, when this bill was brought before the Senate a few days ago, the fact was developed that the beneficiary named in the bill was a reserve officer and that he had received his injuries after the war and after the repeal of the temporary measure inadvertently and improperly passed, which gave certain retirement privileges to reserve officers of the Navy. It was my understanding that the Senator from Colorado would offer a substitute for the pending measure which would generously provide compensation for Mr. Livingston.

Mr. President, there is a very important principle involved in this proposed legislation, and Senators should be fully advised as to the point involved and what the results might be if a precedent were established, the influence of which it is impossible to estimate. I repeat, the question is not whether Mr. Livingston shall be compensated for his injuries, but rather what form that compensation shall take. It is not a mere academic question nor a mere technical question, but it involves a broad national policy which will affect thousands, and perhaps tens of thousands, of individuals and involve tens of millions of dollars.

Mr. President, we can amend this bill, and do it now, and grant to the injured man a very large lump sum or a monthly pension or compensation to be paid through the Pension Office or the compensation agency of the Government.

Briefly stated, the question involved is this: When the World War terminated the question was presented as to the manner of dealing with the temporary or reserve officers and the ex-service men who had been drafted or who had enlisted for the purposes of the war. As I am advised, that question was considered by the War Department and the appropriate committees of the House and the Senate, and it was decided, and I think properly, that the temporary officers and the ex-service men should be treated alike and receive compensation not according to rank but based upon the injuries received. seemed to appeal to the people and to be just and fair. meant that the young men who went from a community and were fortunate enough to be sent to the officers' training schools or to obtain commissions were to be accorded no greater benefits and emoluments than their neighbors and friends and relatives who were privates, but who served their country gallantly.

The same view was taken by the Senate Naval Affairs Committee; but in some way, largely if not wholly through the activities of some officers in the Navy Department, a bill was pushed through Congress which gave to reserve officers of the Navy retirement privileges. I doubt whether half a dozen Senators knew that such a measure had been enacted into law until months after the appropriation bill containing this provision had gone into effect. Congress, when it learned of the measure and of the discrimination which it created, repealed it. The matter was fully considered by the Senate, and the view prevailed that the legislation was unwise, impolitic, and unjust. It was felt that it was an unfair discrimination against the ex-service men who were not fortunate enough to obtain commissions. It was perceived that under its provisions temporary officers who were but slightly injured could be reprivates in the World War.

tired and obtain three-quarters pay for life. Under its operations it was apparent that soldiers who were seriously injured fighting in the ranks would receive a certain sum as a sion, whereas an emergency officer, who never was within a thousand miles of the battle field, and who incurred some disability ratable as 10 per cent, could be retired and as such retired officer would be entitled for life to three-fourths of his annual pay of the grade in which he had served. The application of this law was manifestly unjust. It gave compensation, not in proportion to the injuries received, but based upon grade and even resting upon, as I have indicated, very slight disability.

We announced a principle when we repealed the law to which I referred, the same principle as that announced by the Military Affairs Committee. The Senate took the position that reserve officers, in both the Army and the Navy, should not have the benefit of the retirement law, but that they should be treated, for any injuries received or any disabilities from which they were suffering, just as generously and to the same extent as were their brothers and neighbors and friends who fought as I shall not enter into a discussion of all the reasons which prompted the committees referred to in reaching the conclusion which they announced or which induced Congress to repeal the measure which slipped through Congress without consideration, and, as I have stated, without the knowledge of Senators. But it does seem to me, let me add in passing, that there is a marked distinction between persons who enter the Army as boys and give their lives to the military service of their country and those who served but temporarily. We are all acquainted with officers who, when they were 16 or 17 years of age, left their homes, gave up every opportunity for success and advancement in civil life, and consecrated their lives and their services to their coun-Their calling denied them all opportunity to engage in sess pursuits. They were chained, as it were, to the milibusiness pursuits. tary chariot of their country. They were promised, as a partial recompense for the sacrifices which they were making and which their profession called upon them to make, that in their old age, or in the event of sickness or wounds which would disable them from further service, they would be retired and paid, during the remainder of their lives, three-fourths of the compensation which they were receiving at the time of their retirement. I submit that these officers occupy a different position from those who in an emergency entered the Army for a limited time, expecting soon to return to their homes and resume their former vocations.

Mr. President, that was the view, at any rate, taken by Congress, and that policy is the one which now obtains. This bill now before us seeks to contravene that policy. And because of the severity of the injuries of the soldier in question strong appeals are made and our emotions are aroused in order that the Senate may breach the wall which surrounds this policy. Senators know that hard cases make bad law and the appealing circumstances of the case before us provide most powerful arguments to aid those who are fighting to overthrow the established policy.

As I have stated, Congress, after full consideration, announced a policy that there would not be extended to reserve officers the retirement privileges that may be extended to the Regular Army and Navy officers.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—

Mr. KING. One moment. Having announced that principle, it follows necessarily that we must deal with the cases of reserve officers upon their merits; and I am perfectly willing to deal with this case upon its merits; and to give to the injured officer a generous compensation.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order

Mr. McNARY. It seems apparent that the Senator from Utah has exceeded the time allotted to him under Rule VIII; and he has spoken twice on the same subject.

Mr. KING. The Senator ought to know that this bill was taken up on motion. The rule does not apply.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, yes; the five-minute rule applies.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate is not proceeding under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President-

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Suppose Congress has declined to pass a general law making it the policy that all reserve officers may be retired. That is the effect, as I understand it, of the legislation to which the Senator has referred as having been repealed. Congress did establish that policy, and then it re-pealed the act by which it was established. Supposing that to be the case, can not the Senator conceive that Congress can act affirmatively in any special case?

Mr. KING. Oh, undoubtedly Congress can do as it pleases.

It knows no law—not even the Constitution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not intend to raise the question of power; but I mean there are many general laws. There are sometimes exceptional cases. If there is an exceptional case, not of retirement simply because a man served but of retirement to compensate him by increased pay and rank for a serious injury incurred in the service, can not that be dealt with as an exceptional case? And if Congress passed the bill upon the ground that it presented an exceptional case, as shown in the debate, does the Senator consider that it would constitute a precedent which would establish the right of every reserve officer to be retired by special act of Congress?

Mr. KING. The Senator is an able lawyer, and he knows the value of precedents perhaps better than I, and he knows what would be the effect of legislation of this character.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am speaking not as a precedent to govern all cases in the future but where, as I especially stated, in view of the peculiar circumstances of a particular case, Congress adopts legislation and states that it is not to be considered as a precedent for all cases, but only for exceptional cases, does the Senator think we have established a precedent which would throw down the bars and let in all cases?

Mr. KING. I think this would be a precedent. I will say to the Senator that if this were the only way by which this injured man could obtain relief I should gladly support this bill, notwithstanding the precedent which it would establish; but I suggested to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Nicholson] the other day, and he finally acquiesced in the suggestion which I made, that he amend this bill and offer a substitute giving to the injured officer full and complete compensation; and if the Senator from Colorado had been here to-day he would have offered, I am sure, an amendment along these lines.

I have submitted to the Senate the facts. It is for the Senate to determine whether it wants to violate the rule which it has established, break down that policy, and establish a precedent which will return to embarrass it in the future.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I remind the Senator that there are 1,200 Army emergency officers who will be entitled to the same kind of treatment.

Mr. KING. And the Senator knows that there will be 12,000 a little later. I have received letters from reserve officers, both in the Army and Navy, who want the retirement privilege, and if we extend the retirement privilege in this case we will be required to do so in other cases. We can not differentiate and say: "This man was hurt a little more than you are and therefore should be retired, while you should not." Some of them to whom I refer have been injured, and injured for life, and are wholly incapacitated. They must be cared for liberally, and I shall be very happy to vote for the enactment of legislation here, if there is not adequate legislation now, to care for them liberally; but I am not willing to break down or attack the policy which, after full consideration, was announced by the

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it is admitted that this man was injured in the line of duty in the military service. It is admitted that if the same thing had happened to him under the same conditions before we had technically reached a stage of peace, he would have been entitled to what we are trying to give him by this bill; so that those who are opposing it are opposing it on technicality. Even the Senator from Utah [Mr. King], who opposes this legislation, says that he is in favor of giving this man pay, but he wants to do it in a different way; and then it is said that if we pass this bill there will be others in similar conditions who will demand the same relief.

If that argument is any good, it applies to any system of compensation that we might devise. If that is any defense, we could say the same thing when the Senator proposes to pay this man $10,000, or any other sum. We could say: "Why, if we do that we will have to do it with the others." It is just as broad as it is long, and while we are jangling and arguing and quarreling over how we shall relieve the distress that is admitted to exist in these few cases, the men are dying. While we are quarreling as to whether we should pay them money, whether we should retire them, whether we should give them a pension, or whether we should put them under the compensation law, they are dying.

Mr. President, it seems to me that if the Senator from Utah will think of the matter for a moment, he will realize that the suggestion he has made is not a practical one. We will not be able to get that kind of legislation through both Houses of Congress. If this man is entitled to relief, why not give him relief in this way? It is conceded that he is entitled to it. It is conceded that the fact that he does not come under the general law is only a technicality. It was a long time after hostilities ceased before we technically had peace between our country and Germany. During that time we were as much in actual peace as we are now; and yet a man having an in-jury on one day would be entitled under the general law to relief, whereas if it happened the next day, technically, he would not be entitled to anything.

I admit that there are other cases. It does not make any difference how many there are. In the case of a man who was injured in the service of his country in the line of duty, whether we were technically at war or not, or in the case of these men who went into the war and served a little while after the war, often at the request of their superior officers, why should we take refuge behind a technicality and say that we will not pay them anything? We ought to have a general law, as the Senator for New York has suggested, but we have

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment. The Secretary of the Navy in writing these letters, and in another case that is on the calendar here, has said that if certain legislation of a general nature now pending shall be enacted, this man will be entitled to relief under it. That is true; but that general legislation has failed. We shall not be able to get it passed during this Congress. It is going to be a long time before we meet again. Some of these men are in abject poverty, being sustained friends and relatives. The man that I know most about, whose bill is on this calendar, is absolutely incapacitated for any kind of labor, and his condition is permanent, according to the officers of the Navy.

I now yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator states that he is in favor of a general law, and so am I; but would the Senator favor a general law that would give to an officer four or five or six times the compensation that an enlisted man would receive for a like disability?

Mr. NORRIS. No. Mr. LENROOT. That is exactly the effect of this legislation. Is the Senator aware of that?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I am not aware of that.

Mr. LENROOT. Well, that is true.
Mr. NORRIS. I am not aware of that, and I would not make any discrimination.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, officers of the Regular Army get higher retired pay than enlisted men.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I understand that.

NORRIS. Mr. President, we are up against this proposition: These men must either get relief by special legislation, or they can get no relief for practically a year, and have no certainty of getting it then. It seems to me that we ought not to stand on a technicality when all the facts are admitted. They ought to have relief. This man ought to have relief, and we ought to give it to him,

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Nebraska how we lose any time or lose anything in principle if we simply provide that this man, giving his name, shall be placed on the pension rolls and be paid a pension at the rate of so many dollars per month?

Mr. NORRIS. I would not have any objection to that. Mr. McCUMBER. In that way we would have a pension bill, and we would not break the law which we passed.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that I would not have any objection. If we had that kind of a bill before us now, I would support it. It is a question as to how we are going to meet it. We can not do that now; that is conceded. It is too late.

Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I should like to submit a request for unanimous consent before that is done.

I ask unanimous consent that at 1 o'clock the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that we continue with the call of the calendar under Rule VIII until not later than 3 o'clock; and that at 3 o'clock, or before if the calendar is completed, we proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and which is somewhat in the nature of a substitute. I ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The Assistant Secretary. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following words:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John L. Livingston, late lieutenant, United States Naval Reserve Force, and pay him a pension at the rate of $100 per month.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the total disability allowance that a man would get under the war risk insurance act.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will be adopted. I shall be glad to support it; but I do want to say a word with reference to the statements made by the Senator from Nebraska. He looks upon this matter of retirement and the objections that have been made to the original bill as a technicality. There is no technicality about it. I want to say to the Senator from Nebraska that the retirement privilege for naval officers crept into a bill; it was never considered on the floor of this House or the other House; it has never been granted to Army officers, and the matter was deliberately repealed something over a year ago.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? not care what the method is that is pursued here. If you object to paying this with the right hand, I have no objection to paying it with the left hand. I am perfectly agreeable to the amendment that is offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad the Senator is; but the point I wanted to make was that the Senator was contending for a principle that would pay to an officer a great deal higher sum for disability than to an enlisted man, and that is what I object to.

Mr. NORRIS. I object to that, too. I am perfectly willing to put them all on the same basis. I have no objection whatever to that; but we are confronted, or were until this amendment was offered, with a specific case; and the man is helpless, dependent upon friends and relatives for his support and livelihood, while we jangle about a technicality as to whether we shall pay him, when he was injured in the line of duty just a few days after the treaty of peace was signed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think there ought to be some consistency in the appropriations that are made for these unfortunate cases. The case of Mr. Lancaster passed the Senate a short time ago. No human being could be in a worse condition than he. He was deformed in every way, shape, and manner, and he was a sight repulsive to behold. The Senate passed a bill giving that man $5,000. It went to the House. The House reported it back for $50 a month. This man is in a condition that is in no wise comparable to that of Lancaster. I do not see why this man should have $100 a month and Lancaster have only $50 a month.

Mr. President, I had a photograph of Lancaster here in the Chamber, and some Senators saw it. I want to say to you that if any living soul ever should receive compensation from the Government of $100 a month, he should. The House, however, would not agree to over $50 a month for that man; and it seems to me that it is unjust to pass a bill in a case like the Lancaster case for $50 a month and then give this man $100 a month. There is no consistency whatever in it.

Of course this is a Senate bill, and I am not going to object now to its passage. This man ought to have compensation of some kind. I like compensation better than I do retirement pay, but I hope the House will have a little better judgment as to the consistency of the amounts appropriated than we have in

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the statement of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris]. I think his position on this matter is correct. I do not agree that it would be a violation of any sound principle to retire emergency officers when wounded or disabled in line of duty and give them the same privileges given to officers of the Regular Army. it is in accordance with a sound policy to do that. There was a law on the statute books granting retirement to naval and marine officers, but that law was repealed. In my judgment very few Members of the Senate were advised when the repeal was voted on. It was not discussed; it was not brought up on the floor as a separate measure. It was included in a general bill, as I recall. Under the law on the statute books for the retiring of emergency naval and marine officers several hundred were retired, and the fact that the law was repealed did not vitiate the proposition that the principle was right and correct expense, and who may have suffered injuries in line of duty. It seems to me that it is eminently fair that he ought to be given the same treatment that is given to the Regular Army That question was tried out here in the Senate under the provisions of Senate bill 1565, when the Senate went on record and voted 50 to 14 in favor of the principle of retiring emergency officers upon the same basis, under like conditions, as is accorded to the officers of the Regular Army. The principle is absolutely right.

The present case is an unfortunate one. I would not like to stand in the way of some compensation being given this man, but it is wrong in principle to discriminate; there is no reason why the officer to which the bill relates should not be given the identical treatment given another officer who might have come from the Regular Army and suffered injuries under like conditions. It is true that the House has not passed on Senate bill 1565, but it is also true that a petition signed by 235 Members of the House requested the Military Affairs Committee of the House to report that bill out and give the membership a chance to vote on it. They have not done so. This question will no doubt be brought up at the next Congress, and be brought up on the principle of according emergency officers the same treatment, under like conditions, when suffering disability incurred in line of duty accorded to officers of the Regular Army.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I do not know whether this $100 a month will be sufficient to take care of this poor, unfortunate soldier and ex-officer or not. I got the impression that he was a man of family. If he has a family, this amount will not take care of him and his family. The author of this bill, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Nicholson], is sick. This measure was before the Senate a week ago, and I had something to say about it then. I thought we had an agreement by which the bill was to pass, but it seems there is some misunderstanding about that.

This Congress ought to pause here to-day long enough to see that justice is done this man. He is disabled, his back is broken, and we are quibbling here over a technicality, about whether we will set a precedent in trying to do justice and provide ample means for this poor unfortunate boy who offered to die for his country.

I never hear these technicalities invoked when big special interests are concerned. I never hear the unconstitutionality of a measure suggested here except when special interests are at stake. But when a soldier, coming from the ranks of those who are without great influence with those in authority, just one of several million, who put on the uniform and went out to die for his country, meets with misfortune, is stricken down, the Government is afraid, we are told, that it will set a precedent. I am not afraid of the precedent. If there are other cases seeking relief at the hands of the Senate which are not as worthy as this man's case, we can pass on each case and determine its merits when it comes before us. It will not frighten me to vote for this bill as presented by the Senator from Colorado,

This young man is sorely afflicted, his back is broken, and he is unable to get about, unable to do anything. At best, Mr. President, it seems that he must eke out a miserable existence, and it ought to be the desire of this Congress to make things just as comfortable as possible for him.

I can see this poor fellow now with my mind's eye, coming out I can see this poor fellow now with my mind's eye, coming out from his humble home when the tocsin of war was sounded. I can see him in the uniform of his country. I can see him at the battle front, with the flag in his hand. I can see him directing his men and planning a charge against the ranks of the German army. I can see him—an upstanding, brave, young American officer—ready to die for this, the greatest Government in all the world; and now, when he is stricken down, when his back is broken, and his friends are contributing money by piecemeal to support him, you are hesitating in the Senate and quibbling over technicalities. and quibbling over technicalities.

God, what are we coming to in this Chamber? I suppose I will infringe the rules in a moment, and somebody will make a point of order against me; but I am going to continue to plead for what I think is right and just in this body, for this soldier and every other soldier, regardless of the gag-rule methods that are resorted to frequently when Senators dare to speak the truth into the Record and to the country. What provision does the Senator from New York make for this boy's expenses, dating back to the time he was run over and knocked down and his back broken on the aviation field? None. $100 a month is to begin when the bill becomes a law. to take care of all the expense he and his friends have incurred in keeping him up and keeping him alive? Nobody has made provision for them.

Here is what the report says about this case:

Lieut. J. L. Livingston was an expert at adjusting the delicate mechanism which controls the flow of machine-gun bullets between the spaces traveled by an airplane propeller's whirling blades, and it was while engaged in this work that the accident occurred which has entirely incapacitated him for further service in his special line of work, or, in fact, of any further manual labor.

He is stricken, broken in body, unable to work and get around, and the Senate of the United States is quibbling over the matter of paying this poor fellow $1,800. They are going to put him off on a pension roll at $100 a month, to be laid away in a niche somewhere, fed scantily, and provided for in a measly way, instead of trying to do something to make this boy's life comfortable and make him at least feel that the Government he served so well and offered to die for is grateful to him, and that its tender sympathy goes out to him.

What will he think if the amendment of the Senator from New York is agreed to, merely putting him on the roll at $100 a month from the time this bill becomes a law? What will he think when the news reaches him, if it does, that this bill has been turned down and that a makeshift arrangement has been palmed off on him, and that the Congress that called him into the service, now in its closing hours, sends that message to him?

Mr. President, I think we ought to pass the bill as it came from the committee, as it has been reported to the Senate. I appeal to the Senate in behalf of this unfortunate boy, as the Senator who is the author of the bill is sick and can not be here to plead for him to-day. I do not know this man; I never heard of him until his claim came up in this body for consideration; but the fact that he is an American boy who fought for his country is enough for me; the fact that he is badly crip-pled, as the testimony shows, is enough for me. I think the Senate ought to grant this amount. We will take care of the precedent. Whatever may come hereafter, the Senate can pass on other cases when they come before us for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered 'y the Senator from New York.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to have the amendment reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The Assistant Secretary. It is moved to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John L. Livingston, late lieutenant, United States Naval Reserve Force, and pay him a pension at the rate of $100 per month.

Mr. HEFLIN. What did the original bill provide? I did not hear that read a moment ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be reported.

The Assistant Secretary. The bill as reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs reads as follows:

Committee on Naval Affairs reads as follows:

That John L. Livingston, who, while serving as a lieutenant, United States Naval Reserve Force, was found by a naval retiring board to be permanently incapacitated for active service by reason of physical disability incurred in the line of duty as the result of an incident of the service, but not in time of war, shall be eligible for retirement as if his physical disability was incurred in time of war, and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to place him upon the retired list with three-quarters' pay of the grade held by him at the time such physical disability was incurred.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will pass that hill. I hope the smendment of the Senator from New York.

bill. I hope the amendment of the Senator from New York will be voted down. It does not even provide that he shall be paid one 5-cent piece from the time the injury was received down to the time the bill shall become a law. Surely we can down to the time the bill shall become a law. Surely we can permit this boy to be put on the retired list. We put men on the retired list who are as vigorous and strong as I am, or as any other Senator in this body, and surely we can afford to put this crippled man, lying in his bed, upon the retired list, and give him this sum asked for. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania obtained the floor. Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being House bill 12817, the shipping bill. Under the unanimous-consent agreement it is temporarily laid

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to modify my amendment by adding at the end the phrase to which the Senator from Massachusetts called attention.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The modification of the amendment will be stated.

The Assistant Secretary. After the words "$100 per month," it is proposed to add the words "dating from his discharge from the Nary" charge from the Navy

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York as modified.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York, because I think our incapacitated reserve officers ought not to be labeled as pensioners, but should enjoy the distinction, honor, and benefits conferred on retired regular officers. shall vote against it, because I think the bill is more favorable and more honorable to our injured reserve officers; that the reserve officers injured prior to July 1, 1922, enght to have the identical rights that every reserve officer had who was injured and filed an application prior to October 1, 1921. If we were still keeping Naval Reserve officers in active service something could be said against extending the provisions of the original law, but every reserve officer who was permanently incapacitated and filed application prior to October 1, 1921, has been retired on the same status as the regular naval officers and the active service of all reserve officers were continued until July 1, 1922. How can we distinguish between a reserve officer injured on the 11th day of March, 1921, and a man injured on the 2d day of March, 1921, who were both reserve officers? This man ought to have the same right as other reserve officers injured since the signing of the armistice.

I shall therefore vote for the bill and against the amendment. I shall also propose that the time be extended for all reserve officers, so that every man injured who was a reserve officer up to July 1, 1922, shall receive the same treatment that reserve officers receive who were injured prior to March 3, 1921. There is a decided distinction between receiving money for incapacitation as a retired officer of the Navy and being a pensioner.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I think before the Senate votes on the amendment it ought to understand what has been done by the Congress heretofore in regard to the general policy in such cases. By the act of 1920 the general policy of retiring disabled temporary and reserve officers was adopted. By the act of 1921 that policy was con-tinued, except that it was limited to officers who were disabled in time of war and to those who had made application before October 1, 1921.

So the proposed relief to this officer in putting him on the retired list at three-fourths pay is not a departure from the previous policy of the Congress in regard to disabled naval officers but is an extension of that policy to a very unfortunate individual who happened to be injured 11 days too late to take advantage of the prior policy and the prior law, and whose application did not come within that brief space of six months within which applications had to be made.

We can not denounce the pending bill as a departure from policy, because it is not. We must not confuse the con-gressional policy with regard to the Navy with the other and the much more drastic and stingy policy which has been adopted in regard to the Army. We have been rigid in excluding officers and men of the Army from retirement privileges if they were temporary or reserve or National Guard officers. I think we have been too rigid. But we have been liberal with the Navy, and it seems to me that in a case of such extreme hardship as this it would be niggardly for the Congress to deny this privilege to a man because he got hurt days too late and because his application was not filed within that brief space of six months, when he was lying helplessly paralyzed throughout the whole six months. So I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will fail and that the bill will be passed as originally drawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moses in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the modified amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. BURSUM. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I want to say a word with reference to the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania. He has stated that this is no departure from the policy adopted by Congress. If the bill is enacted into law, it will leave the Congress without any policy. Congress has now adopted a policy that will not afford any retirement privilege to the officers such as the bill now seeks to provide. I am very much surprised that my good friend from Massachusetts should favor a policy that would give to one who happens to be an officer a very much higher compensation than should be given to an enlisted man with the same disability.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But we have already done that. Mr. LENROOT. . We did it, but we realized that it was wrong; and it is now proposed to continue it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I want to continue it until the time when all reserve officers shall get out of the service, and not distinguish between reserve officers who happened to get injured in 1921 and 1922.

Mr. LENROOT. There is just one sound foundation, and that is to give compensation for injury to everybody alike, whether it be military officers, naval officers, or enlisted men of either branch of the service. That I am willing and anxious to do; but why would the Senator from Massachusetts favor giving to a man who happens to be an officer with a broken back, we will say, a very much higher compensation than he would favor giving to a private, an enlisted man, with a broken back

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts and Mr. BURSUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I would favor giving the reserve officer exactly the same treatment that I would favor giving the regular officer. The regular officers are given the right to retire with pay when permanently injured, and I see no distinction between a civilian or reserve officer and a regular naval officer when it comes to extending benefits for disabilities incurred in the service of our country.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very much surprised that the Senator from Massachusetts does not see the difference in the case of a regular officer. We promise him, if he will go into the service and make that a life profession, that in case of injury the Government will take care of him and at a certain age will retire him, in any event. He gives up all opportunity to gain a competence for himself in civil life. What is the case with the reserve officer? Is there any such condition existing with reference to him? He goes in as a matter of patriotic service, happens to be injured, having come from the same walk of life, perhaps, as the private or enlisted man. Why should that officer receive a very much higher compensation for a disability than an enlisted man should receive upon the one hand, and why should he receive that compensation when, in the case of regular officer, the Government in the beginning held it out to him as an inducement for him to make it his life work?

Mr. WALSH : Massachusetts. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin further yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield. Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There is this distinction: The regular officer usually enters the service of his country in time of peace. He does not know whether he will ever be engaged in the service in time of war. The reserve officer in time of war, in time of danger, leaves his civilian employment and offers his life to his country. He faces danger to life and limb right at the start; he goes into war in the very hour of his country's danger; and we should give him the same rights and privileges that are extended to all regular officers.

Mr. LENROOT. But this disability occurred in time of peace

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Washington?

LENROOT. In just a moment. I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he would be willing to give the same compensation in dollars to the enlisted man that he is pleading to give to the officers?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the question were new and being presented to me for the first time, I think I would agree with the Senator from Wisconsin. But we have already adopted a policy and been giving to reserve officers injured in time of service after the armistice was signed the same privileges that we gave to regular officers. Why, if we want to be consistent, do we not give to enlisted men in the Regular Navy and Army the same benefits we give to regular officers when incapacitated in the service?

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator is mistaken. The reason why the law was repealed was because we believed it was wrong; and we gave a short period in which to give those who were not taking advantage of the law an opportunity to take advantage of it. It was not upon the ground that there would be no more reserve officers. I yield now to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think the Senator from Massachusetts is mistaken in his assumption that there have been any cases in which reserve officers injured in time of peace were put upon the retired list.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Practically in time of peace. Mr. POINDEXTER. Pardon me; let me state my position

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It was after November 11, 1918, that he was injured, and the other reserve officers have been retired. It was true the law continued through a period to the technical ending of the war which was in March, 1921, but men injured in March, 1921, before we passed the joint resolution terminating the war, and in time of real peace, have received the benefits of the general act giving them the privileges of retirement, Mr. POINDEXTER. That may be true. Nevertheless, the intention of Congress was, as expressed in the act, to give the benefits of retirement to those who were injured in the war. The disbursing officers of the Government in the construction of that act, as the Senator from Massachusetts stated, very likely did hold that we were actually in a state of war up until the time the joint resolution of peace was adopted, and we were still in a state of war. Now, if we enact a law putting upon the retired list a reserve officer who was not injured in time of war, I would like to have the Senator from Massachusetts tell us how Congress, in justice or in consistency, can refuse to put upon the retired list all the reserve officers injured in time of peace. If one is put on the reserve list, why deny that privilege to others under the same circumstances?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is it not a fact that all reserve officers in the Naval Reserves are now out of the service? Is it not true that on July 1, 1922, every reserve officer ended his term of service? So I am asking that the law be extended to the time that we got through with the reserve officers. We kept them as long as we needed them; we used them as long as we could. We kept them months and years after the war really ended, because they were useful to us, because they were necessary, especially those like this man Livingston, who was an aviator. We kept them to train other aviators, to train men for the permanent service. We kept them from their vocations and professions, and yet we say, "Because you were injured the day after the time we fixed for terminating the right of reserve officers to the retirement privilege, you shall not have the privilege of retirement extended to the regular officers." How can anyone justify such action?

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me briefly to reply, we allowed retirement to naval reserve officers, who were injured in time of war and who made application for retirement on or before October 1, 1921. was necessary to fix some date, and to fix some conditions under which those benefits should accrue. Would the Senator propose to extend that privilege to the man who was injured in time of peace and who failed to make his application on or before October 1, 1921-to throw down the bars, to open the doors so that a reserve officer injured at any time in the service in time of peace and who makes his application to Congress at any time hereafter shall be entitled to the same privileges? Under similar circumstances, if this precedent is set all would have the right to appeal to Congress for the same relief.

I am in favor of compensating this man Livingston because he was badly injured in the service, though not in time of war, in any sense of the word, either actually or technically. But the amendment of the Senator from New York would provide for his compensation and put him upon the pension roll of the Government, and pay him $100 a month. There is a great question as to whether or not temporary officers called to the service of the country in an emergency, who are taken away from their business for limited periods of time, whose entire career is not destroyed by virtue of being in the military service of the country, should have the same benefits of retirement as should regular officers who give up their entire lives to the military service of the country, who consequently can not engage in any civil employment, and who, under the policy which the law has established, founded upon very substantial reasons, after they have served throughout their career, and have arrived at a certain age, or are injured in the service, have the benefit of retirement. If we are going to extend the benefit of retirement to temporary officers, to reserve officers, we open up a distinctly new policy and reverse the policy of the Government. It can not be said that there is any precedent for it at all. In vote after vote here it has been denied, even at this late date, to volunteer officers of the Civil War.

All I have to say, in conclusion, is that if we establish this precedent, in my opinion, we can not avoid the inevitable consequence of doing the same thing for all other officers under similar circumstances.

Mr. LENROOT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York, if adopted, would give to this man exactly the same compensation that an Army reserve officer receives for a like disability, exactly the same compensation that an enlisted man would receive or does receive for a like disability, and much larger compensation than men in civil life receive for disabilities incurred in the service, and I sincerely hope that the amendment will be adopted. We will then have a consistent policy whereby we can afford relief to all deserving cases. But if the amendment be not adopted, we would give, first, a preference to naval reserve officers over military officers, and, secondly, a preference over the enlisted men.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly..
Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What would Livingston receive under the bill?

Mr. LENROOT. One hundred dollars a month. Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. No; he would receive that under the amendment of the Senator from New York. What would be receive under the provisions of the bill?

Mr. LODGE. He would get $1,800 a year.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So the amendment would give him $1,200 a year, while the bill would give him $1,800 year. Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senate can take care of all the other cases that come up hereafter. We are not setting a precedent that is a hard and fast one. This is the only means that we have now to do justice by this badly crippled American soldier. Surely we can strain a point and suspend the rules, if necessary. I would favor that, rather than do an injustice to this poor soldier who is now in bed, who is now being cared for by the charity of the community in which he lives. not understand the position of Senators who stand here and talk about setting a precedent when this is the only means of reaching down and helping this poor unfortunate man.

I do not favor the position taken by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot] of doing alike by all, regardless of the injury received. I would not give as much compensation to a man who had his toe cut off as I would to a man who had his back broken. Who would? We will let these other cases stand upon their merits. We will do justice by all these soldiers. That is my position.

Senators need not be afraid of setting a precedent. We will take care of that situation, but something has got to be done for this poor boy to-day. That is why I am voting for the bill as amended. He gets the same amount through the amendment as amended that he would have gotten if the bill had passed as reported.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only want to say this in conclusion: The Senator from Pennsylvania has shown conclusively that reserve officers have been put on the retired list in time of war. This young man was 11 days too late. He was an aviator injured in a dangerous pursuit while performing his duty.
Mr. POINDEXTER.

Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LODGE. One moment. If he had twisted his ankle going down the department stairs 12 days before, he would have been entitled to retirement; but as he was injured 11 days later, he has to take $1,200 a year instead of $1,800. Of course, I understand that the Senate wants to save $600 if it can.

Mr. President, I know that the proper thing is what the Senator from New York proposed—that there should be general legislation both for the Army and for the Navy. It has not been passed. Whose fault is it that it has not been passed? The fault of the Congress; and we are to stand by the bedside of that crippled man-crippled for life, a man who has given more than life, who has given all that makes life pleasant and all that makes life possible, and all ability to earn—we are to stand by his bedside and say: "The Senate of the United States will not give you anything because, technically, you were 11 days late in getting hurt. We will not give you anything, because it is not logical. We have not passed the necessary general laws, and you must wait until Congress passes general

I for one do not propose to vote to make that man pay for the faults of Congress. I think that man has earned his retirement. I think he has earned his $1,800 a year. Who would take $1,800 a year to lie crippled in bed probably for the rest of his life? Certainly all the medical boards and the board of examination testified that he had no chance of recovery. I think that was her read a secretic for his country. I think that man has made a sacrifice for his country that entitles him to his $1,800 a year; and I for one am not going to throw him out on a technicality because Congress has failed to pass the legislation that it ought to pass.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, there are a great many men dying of injuries and disease incurred in the service who are not put upon the retired list as officers. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] that this man should be taken care of, and should be taken care of liberally; and if the Senate is of the opinion that he should have $1,800 a year instead of $1,200 a year, as is proposed by the amendment of the Senator from New York, all that is necessary to accomplish that purpose is to strike out "$100 a month" and insert "$150 a month" in the Senator's amendment. By doing that we will act in accordance with precedent, under which men who are injured in the military service of the country in time of peace are compensated in accordance with the extent of the injuries which they receive.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that a man who sprained his ankle while walking down the steps in time of war would be put upon the retired list. That is a compliment to the generosity of Congress, but it is not a tribute to its judgment. In the case of a man who received an injury to his ankle, if he is put upon the retired list under the law, as it is proposed that this man shall be put, although he was only slightly injured, he would receive the same identical compensation that it is proposed to give to a man whose back is broken, whereas under the pensions laws the compensation is adjusted to the extent of a man's injury, as determined by the machinery the Government has set up for that purpose in the Pension Bureau.

There is just one other phase of the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts to which I want to call attention. He says this injury occurred 11 days too late. Of course this man would not have suffered any injury at all if he could have prevented it. He would not have hastened his injury to have been in time, as the expression is, to receive a benefit, if he could have controlled the fact. He would have received no injury at all; but he was just as safe in the aviation service of the Navy 11 days after the war ended as he would have been six months after the war ended. That is the point. One day after the war ended, a man engaged in the aviation service of the Navy-when we were at peace, when there were no hostile operations going on-was serving his country under the same conditions in which all other reserve officers were serving the Government six months or six years after the war ended. It is the difference between war and peace.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. POINDEXTER. That difference does not depend upon the length of time that elapses. It occurs instantaneously when hostilities cease. There is the great distinction between a man provided for liberally by legislation of Congress who was injured in front of the enemy, or when hostile operations were being carried on between this country and its enemies, and a man who was injured in the routine service. Although we admit that the service is dangerous and precarious, and that there should be compensation for such injuries, nevertheless the distinction is as perfectly complete 11 days after the cessation of the war as at any other time.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if a man is in the regular service of either Navy or Army, and meets with an injury, no matter how incurred, if it was not his fault, and he was on duty, he gets his three-quarters retirement. There is no sin in that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; but-

Mr. LODGE. Why is it wrong for the reserve officer rendering service in the Navy—he was in the Navy, and on active service—why is it wrong as it applies to him, when we apply the same principle to the Regular Army? I know, of course, that he does not give his life. He gives a great deal more than his life.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand from the Senator's question that he favors putting temporary officers, temporarlly serving the Government, upon the same basis as regular and permanent officers.

Mr. LODGE. That is what we have done already.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. We have only done that in the limited case of those who were injured in time of war, and who made their application by a certain date; and when that legislation was criticized it was repealed.

Mr. LODGE. Nevertheless, it became a law.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It became a law without the knowledge of the Committee on Naval Affairs. It was legislation in an appropriation bill, and passed Congress, so far as I know, with-out any member of the Naval Affairs Committee having his attention called to it. Whether the Senator from Massachusetts is right about that or not, if we are to put the reserve officers upon the same basis as permanent regular officers as to retirement, it is a question that ought to be considered by a committee, and it ought to be thoroughly discussed.

The principle ought not to be established under the pressure of the appeal to sympathy in a particular case where a man is grievously injured and a case which appeals to everybody's sensibilities. Because we want to take care of that particular case, we ought not to give the benefit of such a principle to every man who may have laryngitis, or may have hurt his finger, or may have become in some respect incapacitated for military service under the strict rules as to fitness for military service, and put him upon the retired list and permit him to draw for the balance of his life three-quarters pay. It is not the case of this man only; it is a question of the principle that is involved.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course, the severe strictures of the Senator from Washington apply with particular force to the statement of the Secretary of the Navy, who says:

The department regards this case as a meritorious one and is of the opinion that the bill should be enacted into law for his relief.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator think that the department insists that granting the retirement privilege is the only way of taking care of this man?

Mr. LODGE. I do not say anything except what the Secretary said, that he approved this bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have noticed that the Navy Department always approves this kind of a bill.

Mr. LODGE. I beg to contradict that, because I know they do not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is the Navy Department that is sending other amendments here affecting the pay for the Navy alone when we have balanced in standing statutes the pay of all the services. I am a little weary of it. The Navy De-partments knows that there is no retirement privilege for emergency officers of the Army. Why does not the Navy De-partment propose to join with the War Department, if it sees fit, in having a uniform statute, if there is to be any?

Mr. LODGE. It is open to Congress to do it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I know it.

Mr. LODGE. It is not the fault of this man.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But the Senator quotes the Navy Department as an argument.

Mr. LODGE. I do. I quote the Navy Department for its opinion, and it is worth just as much as the opinions given here and no more

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly; but does the Senator think that this man can not be taken care of by being put on the pension rolls?

Mr. LODGE. I think he is entitled to his retirement like those men who were injured earlier.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Even though the money allowance is the same?

Mr. LODGE, Yes; even though the money allowance is the Mr. WADSWORTH. Then every reserve officer injured in time of peace is entitled to retirement.

Mr. LODGE. If he was in the service

Mr. LODGE. If he was in the service of the Navy, of course. Mr. WADSWORTH. Of the Army, too?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, yes,
Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, now, let us see where we end.
Thirteen thousand reserve officers of the Army are to be ordered to active service for 15 days' training camp this summer. Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator hold that any one of those officers injured in that 15 days' training camp, in the service of the Government, on active service, should be put on the Regular Army retired list?

Mr. LODGE. I think so; if he is retired for disability incurred in the line of duty.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, just to follow out the suggestion of the Senator from New York, at the training camps of last summer one of the reserve officers who was called into the temporary service of his country to train young men had his back broken in much the same circumstances as this man Livingston. He is lying to-day in a hospital; and under our present policy, or lack of policy, his Government can not even pay his hospital bill, much less any pension or compensation or retirement pay, or anything else.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do. Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator knows, of course, that there is a bill upon this calender which will authorize and proyide for his hospital care.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. There is for that particular man; but my protest is against the shortsighted policy which the Senator from New York has pointed out. We have granted some favors to some officers of the Navy. We are trying to cut off the line clearly and deny these favors to men like Livingston, who deserve just as much, and we have barred every Army officer from the same kind of relief; and Congress must take action on it, or these cases will come back to plague it in increasing numbers

As for distinguishing between time of war and time of peace, you can not do it. A man who has his back broken in peace time suffers just exactly as much as if he had it broken at the front in France; and we must remember that a lot of these efficers who get relief because their injuries occurred in time of war were not anywhere near the scene of hostilities. Livingston, who was a naval aviator, an expert in machine guns, was hurt while on active duty. He was running thousands of times the risk of many a staff officer who fell downstairs and got a similar hurt in time of war. Livingston, in time of peace, was exposed to more danger than many of his fellow naval officers Washington in time of war; and it is absurd to distinguish between them and say that one should have relief and the other

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not quite comprehend the feeling and, indeed, the heat exhibited by some Senators in the discussion of this measure. The injuries sustained by the beneficiary named in the bill are grievous, and not only call for sympathy but also for compensation. I have indicated that there is no disposition to deny relief, but have only criticized the plan provided in the pending bill for the extension of relief. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Reed] has just denounced as "absurd" the position taken by Senators who have not indorsed his view. Mr. President, such statements do not settle this question, nor do they aid in reaching a correct solution of the matter. Some Senators seem to be unable to appreciate the principle involved in this As I have stated, no one has contended that an appropriation should not be made that will adequately care for this brave and gallant soldier. He is entitled to relief. Senators seem to proceed upon the theory that if he is not placed upon the retired list there is no way by which he may be compensated. Of course, that position is wholly untenable. debate has clearly demonstrated that Congress has taken the view that temporary or reserve officers are to be differentiated from those officers who are permanent and who have given their lives to military and naval service. Moreover, the facts in the case show that the injuries received by Mr. Livingston at a period after a temporary statute, one which was inadvertently passed, had been repealed.

President, the question before us, briefly stated, is this: Shall we discriminate between the brave soldiers who entered the Army and the Navy during the World War, and give to those who were fortunate enough to obtain commissions different ratings and greater privileges and advantages than those who were privates? I believe that justice and fair dealing require that there shall be equal treatment accorded to all. Let me present a concrete case to illustrate what discrimination would exist if the position of the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Longe] was to be accepted. Two young men enlisted, perhaps brothers, of equal ability and courage and worth. One happened to be made lieutenant or captain or major and was assigned to some clerical position or to a safe place in the commissary department. He never went overseas or encountered any dangers, but met with a slight accident and lost a portion of his finger, or during the epidemic of influenza suffered from its attacks, and was declared by medical officers to be 10 per cent disabled. though, perhaps, the disability is not permanent. Of course, the injuries to the finger are permanent and would be rated as a disability entitling the officer to retirement with twothirds pay for life. The second soldier enlisted as a private, crossed the seas, and fought gallantly in the Argonne and in other sections at the front. He was wounded, losing an arm or a leg. He would receive no retirement privileges but only a pension of $50 or perhaps $75 a month.

Those who are contending for this bill in its original form justify this discrimination and support a policy that would deal thus unequally and, as I believe, unjustly with our soldiers who participated in the great conflict. I insist that they shall all be treated alike. Those who happened to be officers and to have had temporary commissions should not be rated higher and be awarded greater benefits than their brothers and neighbors who were fighting for the same cause. I am told that most of the reserve or temporary officers insist upon legislation giving them the same retirement privileges as are accorded to regular officers. I hope my information is incorrect and that these men who served their country so ably and with so much valor will not seek for themselves advantages and benefits which they are unwilling shall be bestowed upon their brothers in arms who happened to be privates.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] made a fervid appeal, but he did not fairly meet the question involved. He indulged in implications that are wholly unwarranted and presented arguments unsound and fallacious. I do not wish to be unkind or unparliamentary, but I respectfully submit that he indulged in casuistry which the occasion did not call for and which was not entirely creditable to the able Senator. Of course the grievous injuries sustained by this soldier strongly appeals to the sympathy of everyone, but it is not, in my opinion, the commendable thing to distort the situation and pervert the facts in the case. The Senate will deal fairly with this injured man, and they can do so without repealing pro tanto legislation enacted after the fullest consideration; nor need they establish a precedent which may prove of great disadvantage in the future.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I move-and I take the suggestion from the Senator from Washington—that in the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. Wadsworth] the figures "100" be stricken out and "150" inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. Sterling] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon the amendment of the Senator from New York as amended. On that the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, does the amendment provide now that this boy shall be paid $150 a month?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does.

Mr. HEFLIN. From the time he was injured?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does. Does the Senator from Alabama still want to have the yeas and nays called?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; I think not. Mr. LENROOT. I ask unanimous consent that the order for the yeas and nays be vacated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York as amended.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I object to the roll call being done away with. This bill embodies a matter of principle. I object to substituting a pension for retirement, because it is a discrimination. It is denying this officer the same treatment that has been accorded other officers rendering the same service under like conditions. I say they are entitled to retirement, and I am in favor of their having it. The proposal for a pension is nothing more than a policy to avoid giving the emergency officer a recognition to which he is entitled.

I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, the order for the yeas and nays has been vacated.

Mr. BURSUM. I object to the request. Mr. LENROOT. I call for the regular

Mr. LENROOT. I call for the regular order, The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator did not object until after the Chair had asked if there was objection and the order had been entered.

Mr. BURSUM. I demand the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays were once ordered upon the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, and by unanimous consent the order was rescinded. The Senator speaks too late.

Mr. BURSUM. I again demand the yeas and nays.
Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the fact that it was rescinded does not prevent us from asking for the yeas and nays again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the same question?
Mr. BORAH. Certainly, Why should it? I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. Reed] to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. Spences], and vote "yea." The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Elkins] is paired with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Simmons].

Mr. STERLING (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Nelson] and let my vote stand.

Mr. LODGE (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to announce my pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. Underwood], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. Nicholson], and let my vote stand.
The result was announced—yeas 58, nays 18, as follows:

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill

Mr. BURSUM. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I want the RECORD to show, before the vote is taken, that I voted in the negative on principle on the last roll call. I believe in giving this man the amount of money which the bill as amended provides for, but I voted in the negative because I want a reserve officer to have exactly the same status as a regular officer.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I voted with the same end in view as announced by the Senator from Massachusetts. That is why I favored the calling of the roll upon the final passage of the bill. I sincerely trust that there will be a yea-and-nay vote on the final passage, because there were 18 who voted "nay" upon the amendment, and they did so in support of a principle which they thought should obtain, and now they should be permitted to go upon record in favor of the final passage of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator if anyone thinks this bill if passed will set a precedent for putting persons on the pension rolls at $1,800 by the House of Representatives?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I would prefer that this case should be taken care of by a retirement bill, rather than by a pension bill. That is the reason why I voted against the amendment; but I do not want to be put in the attitude of opposing compensation to this disabled officer, and I hope that there will be a yea-and-nay vote upon the final passage of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the

Mr. HEFLIN. Just a moment, Mr. President. I do not intend that any injustice shall be done to the reserve officers. There will be no injustice done to them hereafter if I can prevent it. I am voting now in an emergency case. I am voting for a measure which, I believe, affords the only means of relief for this unfortunate officer. We are acting purely and wholly, singly and solely, upon the merits of this particular case. are not setting a precedent so far as I am concerned. I am in favor of putting this man on the retired list, but we can not do that in the Senate to-day. Congress is to adjourn on Sun-day, and nine months will elapse before we meet again. I want this young man to have something to live upon, and this is the only means by which we can give it to him. It is for that reason that I suggested that this amendment be put on, giving him $150 a month, dating back to the time he was injured. When I voted to give him that I was trying to do justice by him, to give him something to live upon. We are not now barred from taking the case up again and putting him on the reserve list. I do not intend to do an injustice to other reserve officers. I am for fair treatment for all of them and shall so vote when the matter is presented.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

I also desire to announce that the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Elkins] is paired with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Simmons].

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Kelloge] and vote "yea."

So the bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read, "A bill granting a pension to John L. Livingston."

RECLASSIFICATION OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today it adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, and that at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow H. R. 8928, the reclassification bill, be taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON. Pending the request of the Senator from Kansas, I desire to say that my understanding is that he proposes that at the conclusion of the morning business the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of the reclassification bill, and he does not request an agreement to vote upon the bill?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not.

Mr. ROBINSON. He merely desires that the bill shall be considered? I think the bill should be considered and, if possible, acted upon during the present session. I shall not, therefore, object to the request.

Mr. CURTIS. I may state that the deficiency appropriation bill, of course, should be passed. The reclassification bill should be disposed of before the deficiency appropriation bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what he proposes to do with reference to disposing of the calendar? We have spent two and a half hours this morning on a bill that ought to have been disposed of in five minutes.

Mr. CURTIS. As the Senator well knows, I asked for an extension of two hours on the calendar this afternoon, hoping to get through with it. I am perfectly willing that to-morrow, we can arrange it, we shall put in some more time on the calendar, but I thought we had better wait until the reclassification bill was acted upon, because it is vitally important that that bill shall be acted upon as soon as possible.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want also to say to the Senator that I do not think it will take very much time to dispose of the reclassification bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I want to inquire of the Senator from Kansas if it is anticipated that the bill known as the filled milk bill will be disposed of or that the Senate will, at least, have an opportunity to consider that bill before the reclassification bill is taken up?

Mr. CURTIS. Of course, I know nothing about what may happen, but I have understood that after the motion to recommit the shipping bill has been acted upon there would be a motion made to take up the filled milk bill. I have spoken to the Senator in charge of the filled milk bill, and he is not opposed to the unanimous-consent request I have submitted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, I am as much interested in the filled milk bill as is the Senator who is in charge of it.

Mr. CURTIS. That is true.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And I propose to exercise such power as I can here on the floor of the Senate to insure a consideration of that bill to its final disposition.

Mr. CURTIS. If the reclassification bill is not disposed of by 1 o'clock to-morrow, a motion could be made to that effect.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What does the unanimous-consent proposition of the Senator from Kansas contemplate with regard to the balance of the time to-day?

Mr. CURTIS. Nothing at all. After 3 o'clock we can go on with the motion to recommit the shipping bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would like to have the unanimousconsent agreement restated with respect to the remainder of the time to-day.

Mr. CURTIS. The unanimous-consent request is that at the conclusion of the business of the Senate to-day the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, and that immediately after the routine morning business to-morrow the reclassification bill be taken up for consideration.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I understand the application for unanimous consent, all it means is that it reaches ahead into the session to-morrow and singles out the one bill and gives it special consideration.

Mr. CURTIS. It does not make it the unfinished business. Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand it does not. I think there is other legislation quite as important as that which might well be selected for consideration to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Senator object?

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Schatch object.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Wisconsin would not make the objection in view—

SEVERAL SENATORS. Regular order!

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand the position of the Senator from South Dakota, and I want to see the reclassification bill pass, but there is other legislation on the calendar just as important

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no use to read the bill, because I have a message from a Senator asking that objection be made to its consideration to-day. Therefore I object. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over under

Mr. STERLING. I hope the Senator from North Carolina will withhold his objection long enough to permit me to make a brief statement.

Mr. ROBINSON. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is demanded. The Secretary will report the next bill upon the calendar.

Mr. LODGE. Let the bill go over.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, this is the bill known as the "truth in fabrics" bill. The time remaining for the consideration of the calendar to-day is so short that I shall not make a motion to take it up, but I want to say that at the first opportunity I shall undertake to have the bill brought before the Senate for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

JOHN CALVIN STARR.

The bill (H. R. 10287) for the relief of John Calvin Starr was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John Calvin Starr the sum of $5,000 in full settlement against the Government for personal injuries sustained as a result of being struck by runaway Government-owned mail

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REDUCTION OF NIGHT WORK IN THE POSTAL SERVICE.

The bill (S. 3773) to reduce night work in the Postal Service was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. Let the bill go over. Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from South Carolina, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter 50 minutes' night work performed by clerks and special clerks in first and second class post offices, railway mail clerks assigned to terminals, and letter carriers in the City Delivery Service shall be computed the same as one hour's daywork: Provided, That for the purpose of this act night work shall be defined as any work done between the hours of 6 o'clock postmeridian and 6 o'clock antemeridian.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I would like to have the Senator prove the necessity for the passage of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator from South Carolina listened to the testimony that we took on the subject on several different occasions. It is known that there is a large amount of night work required in the various post offices in the first and second classes. We also know that much of the night work would be covered by the proper regulations in reference to the management of the post offices. It is also known that night workers are not as efficient as day workers. That was ad-mitted by all those who testified before the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator whether the bill would apply to all classes, and if not, to what classes would it apply?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It would apply to clerks and special clerks in the first and second class post offices, railway mail clerks assigned to terminals, and letter carriers or city delivery

Mr. NORRIS. It would apply to no post office except those of the first and second class?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It ought to apply, and I am going to propose an amendment to make it apply, to supervisory officials in the offices the same as it does to clerks who are obliged to work at night.

It has been difficult to determine from the department just Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that a great many exactly what this would cost the Government. As I said, it is employees prefer night work in the other departments of our known that we can reduce night work. Since the report of the Joint Committee on Postal Affairs on the subject night work has been materially reduced. Night work is caused largely by the failure of people to deposit their mail before the un-reasonable hour of 6 o'clock. It is also known in the department that they are giving the same attention to second-class mail matter at night that they do in the daytime. Now, the committee believe that the second-class mail matter, or much of it, should not be handled at night, but should be handled in the daytime. If this were done, the night work would be materially reduced.

Now, the question comes up to us, where it is necessary to have night work, ought there not to be a different compensation or recognition from that accorded those who work in the daytime? The difference in opinion among the committee members, and among those who acknowledge there should be some differential, rested in that some believe we should have shorter hours for night work, while others believe we should have greater compensation for night work, the same as is now paid to those who are employed in the Government Printing Office. They get a higher compensation for work done at night.

The consensus of opinion, however, seemed to be that a plan to have shorter hours was the more desirable of the two plans. Instead of increasing the pay, it was believed we should shorten the hours. The request was that six hours instead of eight hours should constitute a day. Your committee agreed that 50 minutes should constitute an hour in figuring compensation for night work between 6 p. m. and 6 a. m. So the bill was reported and advocated on the theory I have mentioned, that something ought to be done to compensate the night workers in the interest of more efficient service to the Government, and in the interest of humanity to the men and women who are employed to work at night, in the interest of good government itself, that we should have the shorter hours for night work. It is on that theory, I repeat, that the committee have reported the bill

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator explain why the bill would not encourage night work rather than tend to eliminate it? It seems to me on the face of the bill it would be an encouragement rather than a deterrent of night work.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think I can show the Senator where it would not have that effect. It stands to reason, after looking over the history of the Post Office Department for a number of years, that they could reduce night work; but they have not seen fit to do so until very recently. They do not want to expend the money. The Post Office Department officials are out for economy as no other department in the Government is, it seems to me. They are not going to employ any more night workers if they have to pay more—that is, if they get less work out of it than otherwise they would, and they are going to reduce the force; that is admitted. has been done since the joint commission on postal affairs reported against so much night work and recommended that it should be reclassified so that many of the employees could be transferred to day work.

Mr. CALDER. Does the department recommend its passage?
Mr. TOWNSEND. The department makes no recommendation, although their testimony is here as to what the situation is in the service.

Mr. SMOOT. It may work that way, but I can not, for the Mr. SMOOT. It may work that way, but I can not, for the life of me, see how it will do so. It seems to me if we are going to give our workmen an hour's pay for 50 minutes' work, the Senator must acknowledge either one of two things, that to-day the man does not do the work he can do in an hour, or else the new basis will cost the Government more If he will do more work in 50 minutes than he is money. now doing in 60 minutes, then the Senator's argument is good; but if that argument is made, it demonstrates beyond a question of doubt that the men are not doing what they ought to do to-day.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is possible that is true. It has always been true that the night workers have not done the same amount of work for the same pay that the day worker has done; that is always true. Now, I am assuming it is going to cost the Government a little more, gradually to be reduced as night work is reduced, and I am assuming also that it is going to make for better feeling in the Post Office Department among all the workers to have some recognition by reason of the fact that they are working shorter hours than they had worked hereto-

ore. I believe we will get better results.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that a great many Government. Personally, I would not, but I know that many of them do.

I will not say anything more about the matter; but I shall be very much surprised if it works out as the Senator says.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I should like to ask that an amendment be made in the bill at the proper place including supervisory employees in the Post Office Department in these same places. We did not include them, and I want to have them included.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, to my mind there is no necessity whatever for passing this bill. It is on the wrong lines. It was discussed before our committee some time ago, probably a year ago, certainly many months ago, and I thought it would go over at this session. I did not think it would come up any more. Another bill which was up at the same time was passed. I therefore have not read the hearings in a long time, and I have not refreshed my memory about the testimony; but the bill says, Mr. President:

That bereafter 50 minutes' night work performed by clerks and special clerks in first and second class post offices, railway mail clerks assigned to terminais, and letter carriers in the City Delivery Service shall be computed the same as 1 hour's day work: Provided, That for the purpose of this act night work shall be defined as any work done between the hours of 6 o'clock post meridian and 6 o'clock antemeridian.

Mr. President, my recollection is that the Post Office Department did not ask for this legislation, and did not advocate it. I am not positive about it, but I think they thought it was entirely out of place and uncalled for, and setting a very bad precedent. That is my recollection of the general testimony, or at least the general atmosphere in the room at the time the testimony was taken.

Anyway, it is a bad precedent for Congress to change the number of minutes in an hour. I never expect to vote for any such law. Sixty minutes is an hour, and now we are asked to declare that 50 minutes shall constitute an hour to apply to this kind of employees! Why, it will not be long before employees in other departments of the Government will be asking the same favor; so we would be setting a very dangerous precedent, indeed, and we would never know "where we were at," to use a common expression, if we set a precedent like this.

My understanding is that there was no big demand for the passage of this bill. They are trying to decrease night work. Not only that but the bill proposes to change daytime into nighttime. Talk about nighttime beginning at 6 o'clock in the summer time! Why, it is two hours before nighttime, and the object of the bill is simply to give more pay for less work.

Mr. President, I am in favor of paying employees reasonable compensation, but I do not believe in a camouflaged way of doing it. If we want to increase the pay, let us increase the pay; but let us not declare by an act of Congress that 50 minutes shall constitute an hour. There was very little demand before the committee for this legislation. It was requested by the representatives of a few of the larger post offices in the United States, and my recollection of the testimony is that they left this very question to a vote of the employees of some of those post offices, and that a majority voted to let the law stay as it was. The idea of working at nighttime was not obnoxious to a great many of the employees, as appeared by the testimony in the case. To use the expression of Judge Watts, of the supreme court of South Carolina, "the milk in the coconut" embraced as follows:

On page 83 of the hearings this is a proper diagnosis of their The witness on the stand here was named E. J. Cantwell, I believe. This occurred before the committee:

Senator Dial. I would like to ask a question. Assuming that a man works 6 hours a day, what do you expect him to do the balance of the 18 hours, after he sleeps a reasonable time?

Mr. Canywell. Well, I would not care to render any opinion on that, Senator. I do not view this question from the standpoint of the time that would be left at the disposal of the employee.

Senator Dial. He sleeps about eight hours only?

Mr. Canywell. Yes. The thing is the hardships and inconveniences and disagreeable things that men are subjected to who are required to do this night work.

Think of the absurdity of any such proposition! This witness complains of the "hardships" and the "disagreeable things" and the "inconveniences" of doing night work. If you want to work at night, you are prepared to undergo the inconveniences of working at night. As I said before, my recollection of the testimony of some of the witnesses was that the employees had taken a vote, and they preferred to work at night instead of in the daytime. The question was presented of rotating them, so that some of them would work a certain number of weeks in the daytime and some of them would work a certain number of weeks in the nighttime; but the employees themselves decided that they preferred to work at night instead of changing to the day shift.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to a question?

Mr. DIAL.

Mr. ROBINSON. If that reflects the viewpoint of the employees, how will this bill reduce the amount of night work that is being done? Will it not, by paying them more, tend to encourage the performance of more night work than is now being done?

Mr. DIAL. Of course it will. Now let us go down further:

Senator Dial. I do not see any difference between night work and day work, as to hardship, except the fact that it is night instead of day. They work at the same desk and in the same building, do they not, with the same surroundings and the same heat?

They are on swivel chairs, you know. They are not out in the elements. They are moving around there, with plenty of the elements. electric light.

Mr. CANTWELL. Of course, in so far as the ordinary things are con-

Mr. CANTWELL. Of course, in so far as the ordinary things are concerned—
Senator Dial. Let us get down to hard tacks. Is it not true that with that extra time they will seek other employment and be more fatigued at night than they would if they worked longer hours in the post office? Is that true or not?

Mr. CANTWELL.
Well, if you put a man at work and concentrate his mind and energy on his work, and have him working under conditions that are agreeable with a contented mind, he will do much more work if he feels—

This witness lays stress on "a contented mind" in handling the mails. That is not a physical hardship. It makes me tired people to come here and say that employees are always balking at a little work. If they do not want to work, they can When they are handling a few letters and working a little stamp it is a different proposition from going out and running machinery where brain and muscle are taxed-quite a different proposition.

I am astonished that Congress should be so silly as to listen to a man who says that the employees would be "better contented" if they got what he asked. After a while they will not be contented if they have to do more than four hours' work It reminds me of the Russians. After we had contributed $20,000,000 to send over there, donated it to them, I saw some time after that where they had struck for seven hours' work instead of eight hours. They did not want to distribute what we had given to them. We are just about on the same parity here. In fact, the employees are doing a little less work They want six hours' work only. The object of this, Mr. President, is to reduce night work down to, six hours, so that a man shall have two employments within the 24 hours.

I rode upon a street car here some time ago and overheard a conversation. One fellow told his neighbor on the car that he had two employments, a double shift, and was getting double pay. I believe in work. I am a sort of glutten on work myself; but I say let the Government fix reasonable and fair rules. If a man is going to work six or seven hours at one place and then go to another, or sleep a while and go to another place and work seven hours and go back to the Government office, he is not in nearly as good condition then to work for the Government and perform good service as he would be if he had to work eight hours for the Government.

We can not improve much on the old division of time, dividing the day into three eight-hour shifts. That is little enough, especially where a man does not use his muscles and where there is no strain on his brain. I appeal to the common sense of the Senate not to go ahead and establish a standard of 50 minutes for an hour. I want to warn you of the precedent that you are setting. You might just as well declare 50 minutes to constitute an hour in all the branches of the Government as to come here and say it as to one branch. The whole tendency is to make your employees dissatisfied. We ought to be men enough to establish just laws, just rules, just working condi-tions without coming here and listening to the whim of somebody just before a presidential or a senatorial election and try to make friends out of a certain vote.

Mr. President, according to my recollection, this testimony before the committee fell flat. There was no demand behind it except by a little organization or two.

Now let us go on down. This man speaks of having a contented mind, and so on.

Senator Dial. That is not the point. My point is, if he has to work for the Government only six hours, he is not going to want to loaf all the balance of the time; he is going to want to do something else, and he won't be resting.

The CHAIRMAN. It is sometimes restful to do something else besides the work that you are doing regularly, where it is continuous work.

Mr. President, we stay here pretty continuously, and I do not know that we are much more fatigued than these men in the Post Office Department, handling a little mall.

Mr. CANTWELL. It is problematical as to how that would work out, I think that is about all I have to say.

Mr. President, this matter concerns the rest of the Senate just as well as it does me. I am sorry that I did not know the bill was coming up. I would have had the testimony of these different witnesses ready; but if Senators care to read it they will find that it is a very doubtful experiment from the side of the employees alone, it is more doubtful from the side of the Post Office Department, and it is still more doubtful from the standpoint of the common good of the country. There is no ground for it; there is no good, just reason for it; and we certainly ought not to establish any such precedent.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not think this bill, being a Senate bill, has a substantial chance to pass the body at the other end of the Capitol during the present session. It is a very extraordinary piece of legislation. The language of it, as pointed out by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Dial.], is very unusual. If it is desirable to increase the compensation of these persons who work, I have no objection to doing that. I should be willing to take the conclusion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Townsend] and his associates on the committee as to whether there is a necessity and justification for increasing the compensation of these employees; but the bill is brought forward under the justification that it will diminish night work, and in the limited time that I have had an opportunity of studying it I am unable to see how it is calculated to accomplish that end.

If the statement just made by the Senator from South Carolina is correct—namely, that many of these employees prefer to do night work—and if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan as I heard it read is adopted, it will be to the interest not only of the employees themselves but of the supervisors of these employees to perform more night work instead of more day work, because the practical effect of this legislation is to give them for 50 minutes' work the compensation that would otherwise be received for an hour's It is an increase, as suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], of 20 per cent.

Inasmuch as it does not seem probable that final action can be had. I believe that the measure ought to be recommitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads for further consideration. I shall make that motion when the opportunity arises

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the testimony referred to by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Dial], because copies of it are before all the Senators. The Senator seems to assume that the case is not a good one and was not made out. Of course I do not agree with him. I do not think anybody who read the testimony would agree with him.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] says there is no chance of passing the bill at this session, because it is a Senate bill. The House has had introduced a bill identical with the one I introduced, and it is now on the calendar of the House, so that there is a prospect of passing upon it. It is not a new matter. It has been discussed in the Congresses for a number of years, and I think there is a general conclusion that something ought to be done on this subject.

I am satisfied, as I said a moment ago, that the passage of the bill will result in reducing night work. I do not say that it will abolish all night work, because we shall have to have some night work-there is not any doubt about that-in whatever way we have a mind to manage the post offices; but the fact that your Joint Commission on Postal Affairs investigated this matter and reported to the department and to the Congress that it ought to be reduced and suggested some ways whereby it could be reduced resulted in accomplishing to a large extent the reduction we were after. The bill can do more. There is not any doubt about it.

I hope this bill will not be recommitted to the committee. The Post Office Committee have considered it over and over again. We have had extensive hearings on the subject. I do not care to occupy the whole time of the Senate on this one bill. but I should like to get a vote on the subject. I think we ought to have a vote on it. We ought to have a vote directly on this bill. There is not any question about it. It ought not to be recommitted to the committee, because, as I said, it has been there for several Congresses, and our committee considered it very

Before that motion is made, if the Senator is going to make

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the Senator prefers to have a vote directly on the bill, I shall not object to that action, but I do think it ought to be a yea-and-nay vote, and for the purpose of bringing in Senators and giving them a chance to understand it, I will suggest the absence of a quorum,

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I first ask that the bill be amended to Mr. ROBINSON. I think we had better determine the amendment a little later. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, just a word before we vote. I have given very little consideration to this bill, but I am in favor of the principles enunciated in the bill. It would affect my State very little, because we have no cities there of over 30,000 population, but I know that in the large cities of this country, because of inadequate pay to many of the postal clerks and employees, their wives are forced to work in order that sufficient means may be accumulated to educate their children.

Will the Senator yield? Mr. ROBINSON.

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why not, then, increase the compensation of those employees, as I suggested a few moments ago, rather than violate the mathematical process by which time is ordinarily computed by declaring 50 minutes to constitute an hour? Why not do the thing frankly and courageously? If an increase in compensation is necessary, as I have already suggested, I am ready to vote for it, but I think we should proceed in that way rather than by declaring 50 minutes to be an hour, or requiring that that be computed as an hour.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not see much difference in getting at the object desired whether we increase the compensation of the night employees or reduce the number of hours they have to work. I take it we will get at the same result, no matter which road we travel. I notice in the report that while there was a difference of opinion in regard to the proposition, a majority of the committee felt that this was the best way to get at the mat-The end is arrived at whether we reduce the time the employees shall work during the night or increase the salaries.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator yield?
Mr. HARRISON. I yield.
Mr. TOWNSEND. We asked the Post Office Department to determine some facts for us with reference to this matter, and they sent questionnaires out to a hundred principal post offices in the United States. The postmasters took canvasses of the employees, and the postmasters themselves expressed their opinions upon the subject. While it is true, as the Senator from South Carolina has said, that there might have been one post office where there was some difference of opinion, and two or three of the postmasters expressed themselves in favor of better compensation, the great majority of them are in favor of shorter hours, and the representatives of the Post Office Department said it would be simpler to make the change by a reduction of hours than by changing the compensation.

Mr. HARRISON. It is immaterial to me which road we travel, as I said. I believe these employees in many instances are obtaining inadequate pay. A man who works in the daytime is at home with his family at night, if he is a good husband. In thousands and thousands of instances in the cities the wife works during the day and the husband at night, and consequently the man is oftentimes prevented from seeing his wife and his children, and associating with them as a man should. I believe that a man who works at night and is kept away from his family is entitled to more pay or shorter hours. I do not care which is decided on, than the man who works in the daytime, and for that reason, and believing as I do, I shall vote against any motion to recommit, and I shall vote for the bill, Mr. SMITH. May I ask the chairman of the committee if the object of this legislation is, primarily, to give the same wage but for shorter hours? Under the bill as written, one who puts in 50 minutes at night gets the same compensation as one who puts in 60 minutes in the daytime. Does this bill mean that the hours will be shortened with the same pay?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It means that for 50 minutes of night work a man will get the same compensation he would get for 60 minutes of day work.

Mr. SMITH. I understand that; but does it contemplate that the employees shall work a shorter time at night, or is it just for an increase in pay for the same length of time?

Mr. TOWNSEND. They will work a shorter term for the same pay. That is the object of it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The bill expressly defines night work as any work done between 6 o'clock post meridian and 6 o'clock ante meridian, so that under the bill itself there are 12 hours in which night work may be performed; and if we make compensation for 50 minutes of work done at night the same as the compensation for an hour's work done during the daytime, we will have more night work done hereafter than is being performed now, because in addition to these circumstances the Senator proposes to make the provisions of the bill applicable to supervisory employees; and instead of carrying out the purpose which the committee seems to have in mind, namely, of reducing the amount of night work now being done in the Post Office Department, it seems to me to encourage and increase it.

Mr. SMITH. The idea I had in mind was this: Suppose an individual has to work three hours in order to get a certain amount accomplished. Under this bill he would have to work two and a half hours and would get identically the same pay. Does it mean that he will be allowed at the end of two and a half hours to finish his work-that is, to go home-or is he to go right on and work the same number of hours but get an increase in pay based on the 10-minute difference?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It means that the day's work ends when hours, with 50 minutes to the hour, expire.

Mr. SMITH. That is getting to the point I desired to make. Under the eight-hour law, a man has to work eight hours in order to make his eight-hour day. Those whose shifts come at night will have about seven and one-half hours' work to do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Six and two-thirds hours. Mr. ROBINSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. If it is the desire to reduce the hours of work to be done by an employee, why not do it by providing that persons working at night shall work so many hours and minutes, rather than complicate the question by outraging the calendar and the laws of nature and every other principle that ordinarily governs mankind?

Mr. SMITH. That is exactly what confused me about the matter. A man will work six hours and a fraction at night, and it will be counted as eight hours' work in the daytime. It seems to me the provision in the bill is better, for this reason, that you do not disturb the eight-hour day. Under the law when six and two-thirds hours are put in at night it is a constructive eighthour day, but eight full hours are required during the daytime. The object is to give the employee the same compensation for a legal day's work at night as he gets in the day; or, in other words, by this legislation to construe six and two-thirds hours as eight hours.

It simply means this, and I can construe it in Mr. SMOOT. no other way: That if this becomes a law, there will have to be 20 per cent more employees to do the same work at night than are employed now. That is exactly what it means, in my opinion, and I can not see it in any other way. If the night employees now, doing all they can do, perform a certain amount of work, and the same amount of work has to be done in the future, if they work only 6 hours and 40 minutes we will have to have 20 per cent more employees to do the same work.

Mr. SMITH. But the point I was making was this: The work done at night is done under adverse circumstances, and as I take it, the object is simply to construe the legality as six and two-thirds hours as against eight hours in the daytime. In order to have the work done as efficiently as it is now done, it will be necessary to supplement the number of employees in order to make up for the remitted time.

Mr. SMOOT. These two questions will come up-

Mr. SMITH. Before the Senator goes into that, let me state my question again. Before an employee could get pay for eight hours, he would have to stay on the job eight hours, at least constructively, or he would not get eight hours' pay. Suppose at night he should work six hours and a few minutes and accomplish all the work he had to do. Under the law he would not get paid for the eight hours if he were at home. Why then, force him to stay the balance of the night, constructively on the job, when he could get all the work done within the length of time and get a day's pay, under the circumstances that attend night work?

Mr. SMOOT. There is only one answer to that-that if Government employees now doing this night work of the Post Office Department are working six hours and forty minutes and loafing an hour and twenty minutes, then, of course, it would make no difference, but if those employees are working eight hours and doing what they should do for the Government under the law, then, of course, we will have to increase the number 20 per cent.

Mr. SMITH. Theoretically the Senator is correct, but practically the Senator knows that there are conditions, especially in the mail service, governed as it is by the schedules of the trades, when the employees could get through with the work and go home and save that length of time, whereas in the daytime it would not make so great a difference. But it seems to me that if those who are on the night shift can get through with their work and accommodate themselves to certain schedules, there would not be any serious objection to it.

Mr. DIAL. If we establish this precedent in this department, does not the Senator think there will be a plea to follow it in any other department where they do night work?

Mr. SMITH. I do not know whether there would or not. It seems to me we have strained this idea of precedent too far. All of us understand the difficulty of legislating for exceptions, but when we are providing rules and regulations for a department we ought to treat them in a spirit of humanity and fairness and justice, and not bind ourselves up too much with

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to ask a question of the Senator in charge of the bill. I presume the measure is based upon the assumption that night labor is more exacting than day labor and therefore ought to command a higher price than the day labor. If that be true, I want to ask the Senafor high work than for day work, if that is what he wants to accomplish, instead of mixing the hours up into 50-minute periods instead of 60 minutes, and making a rule based upon the 50 minutes. If the purpose is to increase the pay, it is a simple thing to say that the pay shall be so much more per hour for night work than for day work.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask unanimous consent that we proceed to vote merely by division on the bill which has been under discussion? I understand that the yeas and nays will not be called for, and that we can vote on the bill now before us and dispose of it.

Mr. ROBINSON. And that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; until we vote on the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Has the Senator any assurance as to the length of time it will take?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I had supposed everyone who wanted to speak on the bill had spoken. If it is going to take several hours and the object is to defeat it by talking and we can not come to a vote directly on the bill itself, of course I do not want to occupy the time of the Senate. But I am assuming that we ought to have a vote on it if the Senate is ready to vote. If that is so, I simply make the unanimous-consent request that we vote on the amendment and then on the passage of the bill by division instead of by roll call.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I hope the unanimous-consent request will be granted. Personally, I wanted to speak on the bill and express the sentiment of the minority members of the committee who were strongly in favor of this method of taking care of night work in the Postal Service. After considering the question from all angles we concluded this was the best way of dealing with the problemto make the time shorter in view of the character of the work, the night work being more physically exhausting. I hope we can vote at once and that the bill will be passed.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection to taking the vote, and I think the bill may pass. I shall not insist upon the yeas and nays, but I shall insist upon a division.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say that if the bill passes there is no telling what it is going to cost the Government of the United States. This will be a precedent established, and it will be carried through every one of the departments of our Government before we know it. I think it is a dangerous bill, establishing a bad precedent. If we are going to increase the pay, let us do it directly and not indirectly, because by the indirect method we establish a bad precedent which would be carried through all the departments of the Government.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, we apparently can not get a vote on the bill without further discussion. If we could do so, I would be perfectly willing to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily, but if we can not I think we had better proceed with the shipping bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Chair present my unanimous-consent request, that in case we can proceed to vote the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside until we can vote? If there is to be any discussion I am perfectly willing to withdraw the request.

Mr. DIAL. I shall have to ask that the bill go over. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection, and the bill goes over.

CAUSES OF DEPRESSED PRICE OF COTTON (S. DOC. NO. 311).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the acting chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, being a preliminary report of the commission on the cotton trade.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I am the author of Senate Resolution 262, upon which the Federal Trade Commission report is based. I ask that the report be printed as a public document and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. understand there is an accompanying synopsis by the Federal Trade Commission, and I ask that the synopsis may be printed

There being no objection, the report was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed as a document, and the synopsis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Letter of submittal.]

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION, Washington, D. C., February 26, 1923.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE:

Washington, D. C., February 26, 1923.

To the President of the Senate:

There is submitted herewith a preliminary report dealing chiefly with the causes of the decline in cotton prices, made pursuant to Senate Resolution No. 262, of March 16, 1922. In a subsequent report it is expected to discuss certain other aspects of the cotton trade, particularly those relating to the operations of the exchanges.

The large cotton planter sometimes sells his cotton directly from the plantation by sample, or through a commission merchant, but most growers sell either to a local general merchant or to the representative of a cotton-buying concern, either at a neighboring town or at a compress point. Among the very numerous regular cotton-buying firms a relatively few concerns handle a large proportion of the cotton crop of the United States. For the crops of 1919, 1920, and 1921, 19 concerns sold the equivalent of from 29 to 50 per cent of each of these crops. Large markets for cotton are found at various points in the South, while "futures" are dealt in on the two chief exchanges, which are located at New Orleans and New York. About half of the crop is exported, which gives to the foreign markets, especially Liverpool, a great influence on domestic cotton prices. Cotton is used chiefly by textile mills at home and abroad, but there are other minor uses, especially for inferior cotton.

The average spot price of middling cotton in 1913, the year before the war, was 12.7 cents per pound, which was somewhat higher than the average price for the 12 preceding years. During the war there was, of course, a great increase in the price of cotton, but the maximum came after the armistice. The monthly average spot price of middling cotton at New Orleans reached 39.6 cents per pound in November, 1919, and from that time up to and including July, 1920, it did not fall below 39.4 cents in any month. The average was over 40 cents in five of these nine months and reached the maximum of 41.4 cents in April, 1920. The highest closing price w

New Orleans from June 20 to 24, 1921, a drop of over 75 per cent within little over a year.

The price of cotton fell from 226 per cent above the 1913 level in April, 1920, to 13 per cent below in June, 1921. The Department of Labor prices for farm products and for all commodities show no such decrease in relative market value. Farm products fell from 147 per cent above the 1913 level in January, 1920, to 14 per cent above the 1913 level in January, 1920, to 38 above in January, 1922. Later, cotton prices advanced again and in August, 1922, averaged 21.6 cents. Although at that time the purchasing power of cotton was somewhat above what it was in 1913, in March, 1922, at the time of the passage of the resolution, it had been slightly below the 1913 average. Since then, it may be noted, the price has risen still further, and in December averaged 25.5 cents.

From 1913-14 to 1920-21 the domestic cotton crop ranged from a little over 16,000,000 bales in 1914-15 to somewhat over 11,000,000 bales in 1915-16, 1916-17, 1917-18, and 1919-20. The average crop was about 12,500,000 bales. The world crop, averaging 20,200,000 bales, showed substantially similar variations. There were comparatively large domestic crops in 1913-14 and 1914-15 and thereafter smaller crops, but the changes in production after the crop year 1914-15 were not very pronounced until the crop year 1920-21, when there was a marked increase. In 1921-22 the domestic crop showed an extraordinary decrease; it amounted to only 8,000,000 bales; the world crop came to a little under 15,000,000 bales.

As to domestic consumption the quantity ranged from a little less than 7,000,000 bales in 1916-17, to a little less than 5,000,000 bales in 1920-21. The domestic comsumption averaged 6,000,000 bales for this period. It was relatively small in 1913-14 and 1914-15 when the crops were large and relatively large in the three following years (which were all war years), as well as in 1919-20, a period of rising prices. In 1920-21, however, the consumption declined sharply while production increased markedly. This was the year when the great price decline occurred, which has been dwelt on in a foregoing paragraph. In 1921-22 domestic consumption increased about 1,000,000 bales over the very low figure for the preceding year. The world consumption did not follow the trend of domestic consumption consistently, but it showed a great increase in 1919-20, the year of maximum prices, and a very marked decrease in 1920-21, the year in which the great price decline occurred. The price movements were also undoubtedly influenced in an important way by the stocks of cotton, and particularly by the annual carry over, so that the external factors of supply and demand were rather complex to say nothing of the psychological influence of forecasts regarding both production and consumption.

The chief causes of the general movement of prices since 1913 referred.

The chief causes of the general movement of prices since 1913, referred to above, are familiar. The increase during the war period and in 1919-20 was due in a considerable degree to the inflation resulting especially from the war policy of the Government of borrowing at low interest rates, which involved maintaining low rates in the money market also and reset of fearer-large-great presents.

The chief causes of the general movement of prices since 1913, referred to above, are familiar. The increase during the war period and in 1919-20 was due in a considerable degree to the inflation resulting especially from the war policy of the Government of borrowing at low interest rates, which involved maintaining low rates in the money market also, and related financial measures.

For particular commodities various other factors were important, so that there were decided differences in the extent of these changes, which were particularly evident in the disordered price advances of 1919-20. The culmination of this advance about May, 1920, was due to a recognition of the overdeveloped credit structure, the great increase in high prices inventories and consequent strain on working capital, and the growing dissatisfaction of consumers which developed into the so-called buyers' strike. The raising of interest rates, the calling in of bank loans, and the rapid break in prices in 1920 were movement was of a world-wise characteristic production. This movement was of a world-wise characteristic production. The appeared in Japan early in 1920. For particular committees the developments naturally varied more or less from the general average results, and, as already noted, for cotton the price went higher before the break and fell lower immediately afterwards than for farm products generally or than for all commodities combined.

The relatively high price of cotton in 1919-20 seems to have been due in part to the expectation that there would be a world shortage of cotton. There was a heavy increase in consumption which seemed to portend the much greater increase which would be involved, if there should occur a return to the pre-war standard. The extraordinary rise in the price of cotton in 1919-20, as compared with other commodities, appears, therefore, to have been due largely to marked increases in consumption, and to anticipated further increases.

The most important factors in the sharp decline of prices in 1920-21

tion agreed during that period to finance approximately 1,000,000 bales of cotton.

In conclusion, as to prices, it may be said that while it does not appear that cotton prices, compared with the general level of prices, are depressed at the present time, it is evident that this does not mean that therefore cotton prices are at a level which affords a compensation to the grower which justifies such an extensive use of land and labor in its production.

The resolution outlining this inquiry also directed the commission to ascertain the respective quantities of linters and untenderable, unspinnable, and unmerchantable cotton. The last two mentioned terms are, according to the trade, very loosely and inaccurately employed, and no satisfactory statistics of quantity are obtainable. In May, 19:1, the Bureau of the Census reported the quantity of untenderable cotton in public storage in the United States at 970,230 bales, exclusive of linters, or 24 per cent of the holdings in such storage places. During the last four crop years the volume of interes produced ranged from 398,022 bales in 1921-22 to 929,516 in 1918-19.

The volume of cotton-future trading, concerning which information was called for by the resolution, ranged during the last four crop years from about 104.5 millions bales in 1920-21 to about 124.5 millions bales in 1921-22. Very roughly stated, in 1918-19 the volume of future trading was nine times the size of the crop; in 1919-20 nearly eleven times the crop; in 1920-21 something less than eight times; and in 1921-22 something over fifteen and one-half times.

In accordance with the resolution, inquiry was also made into the existing laws affecting the cotton trade. The cotton futures act of 1914 apparently has brought about a marked improvement in the methods of trading on future exchanges. The principal criticism from the cotton trade regarding it appears to be that the method of determining the commercial differences of spot cotton for use in settlements made by delivery has in some instances resulted in differences for the New York market which appeared to be artificial.

The cotton futures act, for the ordinary seller's option contract, grants the seiler of a contract for future delivery of cotton the option of delivering any one or more of 10 grades, the money payment being adjusted to equalize the difference in value, and also the option as to the day of delivery in the delivery month. The commission believes that the effect of these options on the part of the seller, as distinguished from the buyer, is generally to make the futures price lower than it probably would be if corresponding buyer's option were used instead. The seller is given a right by law to determine under the contract both the time of delivery in the delivery month and the grade of cotton, and no corresponding contract is provided for with options for the buyer, although provision is made for contracts for delivery of specific grades in the law, which latter provision is practically never used. While a balance between buyers and sellers with respect to value of grade contracted for and grade delivered under present methods may be made by a money payment, the element of quality of goods sold and the option of the seller to choose the qualities delivered may affect the future price.

While traders in futures under these seller's option contracts may be option of the seller to choose the qualities delivered may affect the future price.

While traders in futures under these seller's option contracts may be able to take care of themselves in this matter, and thus the situation may be equitable as between buyers and sellers of futures merely, the matter of fundamental importance is the relation between future prices and cash prices. Both in New Orleans and New York there is generally an absence of parity between daily spot prices reported to the Department of Agriculture and daily closing future prices and cash prices. Both in New Orleans and New York there is generally an absence of parity between daily spot prices reported to the Department of Agriculture and daily closing future prices as recorded by the exchange throughout the month of the maturity of the future contracts. This is not an entirely satisfactory basis of comparison; a better test would be the daily average spot quotation of middling upland cotton of average staple or quality and the daily average future quotation. In the last three years the future, according to the best data now available, however, has been generally lower. But a part of the difference may be due to differences in staple, etc., of the spot cotton, compared with that which is delivered on future contracts. Such deliverymonth discounits, from whatever cause due, probably are reflected also in the general spread between cash and future prices in prior months. This situation, for the reason stated in the next paragraph, may have a tendency to affect unfavorably the prices received by producers of cotton.

Enture prices made on the exchanges are more broadly disseminated.

a tendency to affect unfavorably the prices received by producers of cotton.

Future prices made on the exchanges are more broadly disseminated than spot prices, partly because of the interest in them of a broadly distributed speculative public and partly because the future price is more standardized or easier to describe adequately for commercial purposes. Spot prices are largely quoted on the basis of futures (that is, so much on, or off) and probably they are absolutely influenced by them to some extent. Competition may compel the local buyer to pay a better price than the futures seem to warrant, but the small-town dealer is generally not so well informed as the large buyer of the actual character of the connection between spots and futures and the producer may not fully appreciate the apparent tendency of the future prices to fall short of parity with spot prices. Under these conditions the price received by the producer who has actual cotton to sell in the spot market would logically seem to be unfavorably affected.

Respectfully submitted.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION, By HUSTON THOMPSON, OMPSON, Acting Chairman.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I wish to present a brief discussion of some of the phases of the shipping bill which have not been brought before us for some little time. We are to vote pretty soon, I believe, upon the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to recommit the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to ask him if it is in the nature of a funeral oration that he is presenting the matter?

Mr. RANSDELL. That would depend upon the vote. I do not know whether the Senator and his associates are going to murder this very important piece of legislation. Of course, if it is put to death in such an unlawful manner, perhaps what I say might be treated as preliminary to the funeral eration. But I shall not say it with that end in view, because I am one of those fellows who never knows when he is licked until clear down and badly beaten up. I do not think we are whipped yet. The vote has not been taken, at any rate.

Now, Mr. President and Senators, I would deeply regret the failure to pass the shipping bill at this session. I sincerely hope that it is not going to fail. We have had so much said on the subject, we are so close to the end of the session, and there are so many other matters which are pressing, that I am frank to say I am fearful that a good many Senators, who would like to support the legislation if they had a chance to amend it somewhat, will feel almost compelled to vote against it in its present shape.

If the bill be defeated, I do not think it can be treated as a partisan proposition. The debates on the floor have developed in both parties quite a number of enemies of the measure. There are in the Democratic Party quite a number of Senators opposed to the measure. There are in the Republican Party a number of Senators opposed to the bill in its present form. it can not fairly be said, no matter what the result of the next vote may be, that it is a partisan question. I am very glad of that fact. I know, as a good Democrat, that I am strongly in favor of the measure, and always have been.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am sitting within 5 feet of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, and, although he has a very powerful voice, I have to strain my ears to hear what he is saying. There is too much confusion in the Chamber.

I call for order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator from Ohio. I doubt if many of the Senators wish to hear what is said on the subject. I am afraid that most of them have already made up their minds. But there are some things that ought to be considered by us, if not now, then in the privacy of our chambers after the 4th of March, and some things which I believe the people of the United States should consider and will consider after that Senators, there is one place in the world where, in my judgment, there will be great rejoicing if this bill fails, and that place is Great Britain. I can not believe there will be much joy anywhere in the United States at the failure of this measure, but there will certainly be intense rejoicing across the water. I hope Senators will think about that when they come to vote on this very important bill.

Mr. President, I have no criticism to make of any Senators who oppose the measure. I accord to them the same sincerity of purpose which I claim for myself. I deeply regret the opposition that has developed to it, and express the hope that some time in the future the men who are destroying this measure will develop a better piece of legislation to upbuild and maintain our American merchant marine.

Every speaker who has had anything to say on the subject has admitted the necessity of an American merchant marine. We have tried hard for several years, without success, to frame legislation on the subject that would be effective. party came into power in 1913 one of its first great laws was a tariff bill, and one of the sections of that bill provided for a discriminating duty on goods brought to this country in American vessels. The Supreme Court decided that the provision could not be put into effect because it contravened our solemn treaties with many lands.

In 1920 we passed the merchant marine act, and in section 34 thereof we authorized, and not only authorized but instructed, the President of the United States to denounce those treaties, so that we might put into effect the discriminating duties of the tariff law and thereby build up our American merchant marine as we did in the early days

Mr. Wilson, who was then President, did not obey that instruction, taking the ground, as I have been informed, that it was not a practical thing for him to do. Mr. Harding has been President now for about two years, and he has made no attempt, so far as I am informed, to enforce the provisions of section 34 of that act. So we got no benefit whatsoever from those provisions.

We therefore were left in the situation of men with an immense asset to take care of, a tremendously big, valuable, and most costly property, and no means of handling it. So it seemed necessary to do something, absolutely essential to do something.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—
Mr. RANSDELL. Just a moment. The Shipping Board and many friends of shipping in the country collaborated together, and a number of the leading shipping experts and scientists of America put forth their very best efforts to prepare suitable legislation. The result was the pending bill. I am assured that in the preparation of this measure there was no politics. There were a great many Democrats among the men who helped to frame the measure. I know there are three good, true, and tried Democratic members of the Shipping Board, which was the principal agency in the preparation of the bill.

I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. If I understood the distinguished Senator correctly a moment ago, he made the statement that the Su-preme Court held that the provision of those treaties providing for reciprocity in ocean rates was not repealed by the tariff act. I have heard substantially that statement made several times heretofore during the discussion.

I think that the Senator has not—and I say this with all due respect—accurately stated the holding of the court in that behalf. It is true that the court did say that the differential provided for in the tariff act was not applicable in the cases which were then before it. But that was because of a proviso in that law, and if it will not interrupt the Senator-because I know he wants to be right, as we all do-I should like to call attention to the decision.

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be very glad, indeed, to have the Senator state exactly what the decision was.

Mr. POMERENE. The decision will be found in the Two hundred and forty-third United States Supreme Court Reports at page 97. With the permission of the Senator, I will read the syllabus. This was in what was known as the Five Per Cent Discount case. The syllabus reads:

Section 4, paragraph J. subsection 7, of the tariff act of October 3, 1913 (ch. 16, 38 Stat. 114, 196), after declaring that a discount of 5 per cent on all duties imposed by the act shall be allowed on such goods as shall be imported in vessels admitted to registration under the laws of the United States, adds, by way of proviso, "that nothing in this subsection shall be so construed as to abrogate or in any manner impair or affect the provisions of any treaty concluded between the United States and any foreign nation."

That is what I desired to call to the Senator's attention.

Held that the grant of the discount is confined to goods in American bottoms, and the effect of the proviso is to respect the treaty privileges with which such a grant would be in conflict, not by extending the grant to goods borne in foreign vessels, but by suspending the grant entirely while such privileges exist.

In other words, the tariff law was so framed that it preserved to foreign nations every right which they enjoyed under other treaties and other conventions. It did not attempt to abrogate either those treaties or those conventions. That was the point to which I wished to call the Senator's attention.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator for his contribution to my speech. It is very helpful. But no matter what view he or anyone else may take of it, the simple fact remains that we have not placed in effect the tariff provisions which would give us the discriminating duty; and the further fact remains that Congress found it necessary to enact section 34 of the shipping act of 1920, the avowed purpose of which was to authorize and direct the President to denounce all of these treaties in order that we might be free to enforce such a discriminating provision. Unless the treaties are denounced, in some way and reenacted I do not see how we are ever going to enforce a practical discriminating provision in the law. Perhaps the Senator could suggest some method; and if so, he would prove himself a wonderful friend of American shipping.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—
Mr. RANSDELL. I will yield in just a moment.
Let me say that this country built up a great merchant marine in the early days through the medium of and with the aid of a discriminating duty. There is absolutely no doubt about that, as all students of American shipping admit; and I say here and now, as I have said before on the floor of the Senate and many times in private conversation, that a discriminating duty giving reasonable discount in tariff rates on all goods brought to America in American bottoms would please me a great deal better than the direct-aid plan proposed in the pending bill.

It is only because I became convinced that we could not get the discriminating duty, because I felt that the imperative necessity was so great, because it is so necessary to act, and act now-not next year, or two years from now, or four or ten years, but now-in order to preserve the mighty fleet of ships which are going to destruction so fast that I gave my consent to support the direct-aid feature of the pending bill.

I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not care to interrupt the distinguished Senator during the progress of his argument. I expect to touch upon that subject a little bit later. perfectly simple proposition to get a system of preferential rates. Congress had that in mind when the shipping act of 1920 was passed.

Under section 34, the Congress of the United States commanded the President to serve notice upon the nations of the world that these treaties and conventions were to be abrogated. The distinguished President at that time, as well as his successor, refused to carry out the mandate of Congress. Of course, if a President will not carry out the mandate of Congress, then that legislation can not be made effective, perhaps; but it was none the less the duty, as I conceive it, of both of those Presidents to carry out the will of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. RANSDELL. I agree absolutely with the Senator from Ohio. We have that legislation; it is on the statute books; and I sincerely hope the Senator will be able to devise some means to require the President to obey the law in that rehe can not do that, that he will suggest means by which a discriminating duty can be put into effect; for, Mr. President and Senators, it is absolutely essential that something be done without delay to assist the American merchant the policy they have followed.

marine. It is not possible, in my judgment-and I have studied the subject closely—for us to compete on fair, equal terms with the other nations of the world, where labor is cheaper. where the conditions of shipping are altogether different from ours, where the space required for people to live is much scantier than ours, where everything, in substance, is on a lower scale than in our country-it is impossible for us to compete, especially with those countries which for centuries have been building up their merchant marines, unless we give some immediate, direct aid.

I do hope sincerely that the Senator from Ohio or some other Senator will evolve a successful method which can be enacted into law; and when you have found it and convinced me of its merits, Senators, let me say to you it will have no more enthusiastic supporter than myself. What I desire with all my heart is to build up a real effective American merchant marine, and I do not balk at methods so long as they are honorable. I wish to have American goods carried in American bottoms flying the American flag to every sea in the world, and whatever gives reasonable promise of accomplishing that purpose will receive my support. I particularly wish, sirs, to conserve, maintain, and make available the great fleet of ships we were forced to build under the exigencies of the late World

I think, also, Mr. President, in this connection, that the country is going to expect something of the people who kill this bill. When you oppose a thing that may not be perfect in itself, but which does propose to correct a very important evil, you are expected to offer something better. You can not afford to be merely a destructionist. You must be a constructionist. The country is not going to have any patience with those Senators who oppose this measure and offer nothing better in lieu thereof.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President-

I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee. Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator know that I have offered a complete substitute for the bill, which includes every-thing that is in the present bill except the cash-subsidy pro-visions thereof, and that in lieu of those provisions I have offered a provision that fixes a discriminating duty of 5 per cent upon all goods brought in in American vessels? Does not the Senator believe that such a provision would help build up our merchant marine, and has he not in the past voted for such a provision?

Mr. RANSDELL. I was aware of all of that, Mr. President. Now, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. Mr. RANSDELL. Did the Senator from Tennessee make any effort to secure a vote on his amendment? Has he not joined with a number of other Senators here to prevent a vote being had on this bill at this session; and has he not exercised the prerogative which belongs to him and every other Senator of filibustering against the bill and admitting that he and others were going to talk it to death because they did not believe in it? If he really believed in the merits of his own proposition, why, sirs, did he not secure a vote on his proposition?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will take pleasure in answering the Senator. Inasmuch as the administration had committed itself to the original bill, it was impossible for me to get a vote on it. I did everything possible to secure a vote on it. I offered it; I sent it around to Senators; I even submitted it to the Senator from Washington, the chairman of the committee, who, I believe, is very favorable to it; but he was in a position where he could not take it up.

I believe that the cash subsidies of the present bill are so out of harmony with what we believe in in this country, I believe that those provisions would so injure the merchant marine we now have and so prevent its building up, that I felt that it was my duty to prevent in every honorable way the pasage of

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I am not going to debate all of those points with the Senator. The fact is apparent to all of us who were here and followed this debate that no serious attempt was made by any one to have a substitute adopted for this measure. No attempt of any kind was made before the Commerce Committee to have a substitute adopted for it. No real effort that I ever heard of was made in the House of Representatives to have a substitute adopted for it. There are undoubtedly some good things in the Senator's provision, and I would favor them if I thought they could be put into effect, If I were convinced right now that they could be passed in lieu of this bill and become law I would take them, because that would be at least a step forward. That would be construction. It would not be merely a denial of everything, such as the Senator and others have succeeded in bringing about by Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am quite sure that if the Senator from Louisiana and his colleague and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], who voted against the return of this bill to the committee, would join the other Democrats, they could easily get a vote on my substitute; and I want to say that by this time next year there will be no differences between the Senator from Louisiana and myself. We will both be fighting for the substitute.

Mr. HARRISON, Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. HARRISON. How are we going to be able to give very much further consideration to this ship subsidy bill when the President only Saturday, in a message reinforced by a communication from the Secretary of State, asked the Congress to take up the important question of entering the international court? It seems to me that if we are to get that through we shall have to begin work on it pretty soon.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not suppose the Senator from Mississippi is very anxious for an answer to that question. It is pertinent, of course. Everybody knows there is going to be a vote very soon on the motion to recommit the shipping bill which may dispose of it for the session.

Mr. President, I think we should realize what we are dealing with. This is not a political issue, as I have said. It is not a question of Republican or Democratic advantage. It is a question of the future, not only of American shipping but of American commerce. National prosperity and national security are in the balance with the shipping bill. Let us be partisans, not Republican or Democratic partisans, but partisans of America.

We have voted nearly $50,000,000 this year for many affairs of national importance. I concur heartly in most of these appropriations, but if we fail to vote the scanty millions—few by comparison—involved in the shipping bill, what will be the result? The American merchant marine will be throttled and the vast sums already expended on it will benefit, in the main, foreign shipowners, for there will be but a shadow of our present fleet left in the carriage of our foreign commerce.

In all the world to-day there is hardly one maritime nation whose vessels transport so insignificant a portion of their country's trade as ours do; and yet, in all the world there is only one nation with a greater mercantile fleet than we have. A few years ago we were building more ships than all the rest of the world put together. Last year we had fallen to fifth place; and unless something is done to enable us to maintain our ships on the seas, American shipbuilding will become an almost extinct industry. We still stand second to Great Britain among nations in the tonnage held, but that position, too, is menaced. Germany is creeping steadily to within striking distance, and Japan, France, Italy, Holland, Norway, and other countries are potential rivals.

Month by month less of our imports and exports are carried by our own vessels, and more by those of the foreigners, until now barely more than a quarter of our actual overseas trade moves in American bottoms. Who is the gainer by this? Will anyone say that it is the American people?

There are those who declare that it makes no difference who transports our goods so long as they are carried as cheaply as possible; but will anyone claim that with the American flag driven from the seas through legislative neglect, and with foreigners in absolute monopoly of our ocean commerce, freights will remain at the low levels at which they have been held solely because there has been a supply of American ships that has prevented the fixing of extortionate. rates?

Mr. President, let me remind the Senate of the situation in the summer and fall of 1914, when Great Britain, Norway, and other shipping countries were obliged, because of the ravages of the German submarines, to withdraw many of their ships from the seas. What was the result upon the American commerce which had to be shipped abroad in foreign vessels, as we had no American ships to take it? Freight rates bounded forward with tremendous pace. I can not give you exact figures, Senators, but several hundred per cent increase in the freight rates on all our foreign shipments immediately came about. The result, sirs, was that the farmers of America, the people who are said to oppose this legislation to a great extent, were obliged to pay these very exorbitant freight rates to get their goods shipped abroad.

Let me remind you of another situation. When the war occurred between Great Britain and the little Boer Republic in South Africa, a small country that put up a wonderful fight, Great Britain was obliged to withdraw from its overseas trade at least 250 of her commercial vessels. Did Great Britain and her colonies suffer by this withdrawal? Not so far as I know: but the American shipper of goods to foreign lands did suffer materially. I shall not attempt to go into details, but ask to publish as part of my remarks, in 8-point type, a brief ex-tract from a prize essay entitled "Our Merchant Marine," by Naval Constructor T. G. Roberts, United States Navy, published in the Naval Institute Proceedings of 1910, which describes this situation and explains how essential it is to every country to have its own merchant marine.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

[Excerpt from the United States Naval Institute.]

"To control is to fix and to determine; to be controlled is to be dependent upon and await the pleasure of. Foreign steamship companies determine our shipping freight rates; they determine the ports through which shipments are made, thereby building up one port to the detriment of another; and in case a foreign war breaks out these ships are subject to be withdrawn and employed in the war, in which case our goods would lie upon the wharves awaiting the further disposition of the remaining foreign shipping of countries not engaged in the war. At the outbreak of the Boer War, in 1899, Great Britain wit-drew 250 steamships, of about 1,000,000 tons, from commerce and converted them into use for transport and supply service. The ships of the North Atlantic being, as a rule, large and swift and most suitable for this service, were drawn upon for the most part, and the export trade of this country was the hardest hit. It was then we had a rude lesson of our dependence upon foreign ships. When the best ships had thus been withdrawn to undertake profitable Government charters, some were replaced by a few old, cheap, and inefficient craft with which to carry our goods. In the port of Boston alone the number of sailings in 1900 with grain, flour, provisions, and cotton, was 46, or 13 less than the year before, and some of these were in inferior vessels of smaller tonnage. According to the Boston Chamber of Commerce, the tonnage cleared at that port in the first four months after the outbreak of the war was 215,960 tons. The Boston Commercial Bulletin stated that in the year the export in corn had been reduced from 2,107,694 bushels to 302,924 bushels, the actual decrease in cereals having been 1,750,000 bushels. The American shipments elsewhere were demoralized. The cattle shipments were reduced by about 4,000,000 head, out of about 30,000,000, England being our chief customer. Our export breadstuffs, going all over the world and carried mostly by British ships, shrank from $318,000,000 in 1898 to $270,000,000 in 1899 and $251,000,000 in 1900, in round The freight rates, however, were increased by 30 per cent, and the British shipowners lost nothing on the deal; but our farmers and merchants thereby contributed many millions of dollars to the subjugation of the Boer Republic. And yet our farmers and their representatives in the West are opposed to ship subsidy, while they are said to have contributed enough in the Boer War to subsidize our own foreign shipping for 20 years! The total of our losses in that war can not be fully estimated, but the effects were felt throughout the entire country; and that was in a war directed against a small country possessing not a single privateer or cruiser. What, then, if two large countries like Germany and England should go to war? We would be left high and dry upon the beach, without shipping to carry our commerce." (Naval Institute Proceedings, 1910. Prize essays, "Our Merchant Marine," by Naval Constructor T. G. Roberts, U. S. N.)

Mr. RANSDELL. Let us look at the situation squarely. We think of ourselves as a great creditor Nation in international designs of the process of tional trade because we export more than we import. In 1921, it is true, we sold 11,000,000 tons more of cargo than we bought: but in 1922 we bought 4,000,000 tons more than we sold, and the ratio is increasing. It is also true that the value of those exports was greater than that of the imports. the gross balance in our favor was $1,976,000,000, while in the year just ended it was only $804,000,000 greater. And the money that went out of this country last in payments to foreigners for freight, insurance, and other shipping services was almost sufficient to wipe out our credit balance and transform us to a debtor nation. This would not be the case if our ships could carry a fair share of our commerce, for then much of the millions that now flow from us to other countries would be retained here. It is in our power to bring this about by passing the pending measure and restore us to the position of a creditor the world's commerce.

To whose advantage is it that this legislation should die? There are not lacking Americans who are opposed to subsidization, aside from political reasons. We have been told that American agriculture is against the bill, and farm papers have declared that the farmers stand overwhelmingly in opposition. The same publications have attacked the proposed legislation, but the arguments used are so utterly at variance with the facts, so based on misconception or misinformation, that the American farmer who has formed his opinion from these utterances is not to be blamed for hostility to the shipping bill.

At this point I ask leave to print in 8-point type as an appendix to my remarks, a very interesting address delivered before the annual convention of the National Merchant Marine Association in this city on the 7th day of this month by the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones]. It is brief and to the point. The speech was entitled "The shipping bill from the farmer's standpoint."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See Appendix 1.)

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. RANSDELL. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I would like to get unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD, at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Louisiana, a very able speech delivered on February 22, at Topeka, Kans., by the Hon. Cordell Hull, on "The farmer and the tariff-Stable foreign markets necessary for American farm prosperity." I ask that it be printed in 8-point type.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See Appendix 5.)

Mr. RANSDELL. We have been told that American labor is against the shipping bill. I deny it. It is true that the American Federation of Labor and the International Seamen's Union are on record in opposition. But both these organizations have in their ranks thousands of naturalized and unnaturalized members. Is this "American" labor? I prefer to believe that the true picture of the attitude of our workers is presented by such action as that taken by the National Association of Marine Engineers, real Americans all, who have broken away from the Federation of Labor to give their support to the legislation designed to make an American merchant marine possible.

I shall do no more than touch on the stand of the radical elements in this country in opposition to national aid to shipping. Their very denunciation of the measure is a tribute to its constructive value. But I do want to deal briefly with another class of antagonists within our borders. high places men nationally known who have declared themselves against any plan that would serve to develop the American merchant marine. They never give the real reason for their opposition, however. This lies in their pockets and its roots are hidden in a tangle of international commercial relationships. The farmers of America have been told that Wall Street is strongly behind the shipping bill; but I say to them that Wall Street, and especially that great dominating factor in it which may be called international money is bitterly opposed to anything that will take from foreign shipping any portion of the great bulk of our trade which it now carries. American shipping has no stronger fee than the international American, while the American American—the real American—is its friend.

So much for the enemy at home. Those who abet him must know that they can no longer do so unwittingly. And now a word for our opponents abroad. Let us look at the situation through the eyes of the foreigner; say, through the eyes of the Briton, for he is concerned in the greatest degree.

For a long period of years, Great Britain, although possessed of considerably less than half the world's tonnage, has been carrying considerably more than half of the total sea commerce of the world. Two-thirds of her own exports and imports have moved in British ships, nine-tenths of the commerce with the British possessions, and a third of the trade between non-British nations. The gold brought to Britain through the earnings of her vessels alone has been sufficient to more than offset the excess of the value of her imports over her exports and to make her a creditor and not a debtor nation in world trade. She has therefore viewed with a jealous eye any development that would tend to reduce her huge share in ocean transportation.

But nothing occurred to arouse her jealousy until after the war. It was in response to her urgent cry for war aid that the bulk of the American merchant marine in existence to-day came into being. She was anxious that we should turn out as many merchant ships as possible to aid her in the war; but immediately the conflict was over our newborn shipping became a menace in British eyes. With a volume of cargoes much less than before the war, and with a world shipping much greater, due chiefly to our new tonnage, it was manifest to her that if employment was to be found for our merchant ships it must mean a lessening in the proportion of the world's commerce British carried. The ships that she had clamored so loudly for us to build she was now anxious to see eliminated from trade competition. If only the American merchant marine was out of the way, she figured, there would be cargoes enough for all the existing tonnage and she would be able not only to hold but to tighten her clutch on the control of the world's sea trade. Any legislation on our part to enable our vessels to compete with the cheaper built and operated foreign ships she was certain to regard with hostile eyes. To compete with unaided American ships, she knew, would be an easy matter, for the slow elimination of the great bulk of our trade fleet under these circumstances was certain.

The steady shrinkage in the proportion of our trade carried by our unprotected ships in the past three years is proof of the accuracy of that estimate. With ten times the ocean-going tonnage we had before the war we are carrying less than three times the proportion of our exports and imports that we were then. Is it any wonder that Great Britain, satisfied that we are on the road to maritime extinction under a continuance of the present conditions, should be bitterly opposed to anything that would tend to change those conditions, as the pending bill would? We could make no greater gift to Great Britain than to withhold aid from our shipping. The remission of her war debt to us would be slight in comparison with it.

I have said before that to defeat this measure would be to play Britain's game for her. I repeat. I read to you some months ago proof of Britain's sentiment toward us, as outlined in the leading organs of British opinion. I have shown from the reports of the British Government itself that the loudly professed British policy of "free and equal opportunity on the seas" is a policy based on cold, business principles, because it puts money in her pockets and not because of any international idealism. I have shown you from the records of British shipping how great the hold of that shipping is on the trade of other nations. I have told these things and I do not propose again to go into the details of them, nor to repeat the British threats I have previously cited of what they would do to us if we dared to take steps to help our own shipping, to safeguard our country, and to increase our commerce. however, to read one very recent and very typical sample of the British attitude toward us. It is from the leading British shipping publication, Fairplay, in its issue of January 11 last, and note how the sword of enmity rattles under the cloak of friendship. Fairplay states:

Fair commercial rivalry is the breath of life to us. It is its friendly friction that has kept the people of this effete old country awake. And if our shipowners have to meet nothing worse than an American mercantile marine run on the same principles as our own [italics mine], they will be ready enough to give and take a reasonable amount of buffeting with the utmost impartiality. Of course, should it so happen that as a consequence of direct aid [Italics mine] American vessels were able to offer rates which our shipowners could not possibly accept, something might have to be done ly the Government [italies mine], and if this were to occur and if public opinion were favorable, the results might be lamentable, for nations call each other's bluff passions easily flame up."

Here, then, is the issue as Britain sees it. She will be content if we run our merchant marine on the same principles as they run theirs. What are some of these British marine principles? Lower wages, poorer food, cheaper ships. How shall we obtain them? By cutting Americans down to the level of cheap foreign labor, by reducing their meals in quantity or quality, or both, or by scanting on the construction of our vessels? Is that what we want-to lower the standards of American living and American safety? That is one way to do it, but it is not the way we purpose to take. The right way lies in the passage of the pending legislation which provides offsets for the cheaper scale of foreign operation without taking it out of the pay and out of the food of American seamen. Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President— The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield. Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator does not mean to say that there is any material difference between the cost of operating a British ship and the cost of operating an American ship, so far as wages and food and maintenance are concerned, does he?

Mr. RANSDELL. My understanding is that there is a very material difference.

Mr. CARAWAY. I happen to have heard Mr. Rossbottom say the other day that there was not any, and he is operating ships successfully in competition with the British. If the Senator would read all the testimony, even including that of Mr. Lasker, he would find that there is very little difference. I am just curious to know if the Senator has made all of his speech totally disregarding the testimony, as his last paragraph seems to indicate he did, because if he had read the testimony he would have known that all the witnesses who testified about it were against his position.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not understand it that way at all. Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator will take three minutes to read the testimony, he will understand it so.

Mr. RANSDELL. We had a great deal of testimony— Mr. CARAWAY. And all of it was agreed that there was practically no difference.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not understand that to be a fact. If the Senator thinks that way, I suggest that he put the testi-mony in the Record in his own time; but I do not understand it that way. I am always just as courteous to the Senator as I can possibly be, and I have answered his question. I was on the committee, just as he was. I attended a number of the hearings and I have gone into this question as closely as I can go into it. I understand that the British ship furnishes a much smaller space as living quarters than is furnished in our ships; I understand the cost of constructing ships in Great Britain is very much less than in America, and hence the overhead is a great deal less than it is in this country. I understand, from the best evidence I am able to examine, that the food furnished the British sailors is not as good or as expensive as the food furnished our sailors, and that the wages also are less. I admit that some of the witnesses differ in regard to that, but the preponderance of the evidence, as I understand it, proves those facts.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator another question, because I want to get the facts. If the Senator has in mind somebody who was informed, who made a statement different from that I have made, who was the witness? Evidently I have overlooked him.

Mr. RANSDEILL. I have not that testimony before me. Mr. CARAWAY. I remember so many who testified to the

Mr. RANSDELL. We had a great many witnesses in regard to that. Certainly the Shipping Board gave evidence of the kind I have indicated. All of the conclusions of the board lead to that end. The people I have talked with lean that way, and those are the facts as I find them. The conclusions are exactly as I have stated, and I do not think the Senator can disprove

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator did not feel as if it would be an intrusion on his time I could tell him of some who testified to the contrary.

Mr. RANSDELL. I would prefer to have the Senator bring that out in his own time.

Mr. CARAWAY. Very well. Mr. RANSDELL. To resume the line of my remarks, if we pass the shipping bill, however, Britain serves notice on us— the British Government may be obliged to "do something," and decidedly so if our vessels are able to best theirs in competi-tion. And, in that case, we are assured "the results will be lamentable."

There is the threat-bald, naked, unmistakable. Shall we haul down the American flag from our ships because of that? Shall we continue to do as we are doing now, stand idly by and see foreign vessels drive our own ships out of our own trade? Shall we cower at Britain's bluff or shall we give aid to our own ships in our own trade, preserve our rightful place on the seas, and safeguard our commerce and provide for the national security?

With whom shall we stand? On the one side we have the strange medley of radicals and foreign-born laborers masquerading as Americans; and the forces of international money, also under an American mask, joining hands with our foreign rivals to scuttle the American merchant marine. On the other side are the representatives of real American industry—the men who fought for us in the World War, the Americans on our ships—and not a foreign element of any description. I have said it before and say it again with the highest respect for the Senators who differ in opinion from me that a vote against the shipping bill is a vote against America and a vote for the aliens to whom the destruction of our commerce and our national safety will be all the greater triumph because it is wrought by ourselves.

Mr. President, the shipping bill has been before the Senate now-intermittently of course, because of the necessity of passing the appropriations measures-for more than two months. In that time the debate has brought forth many interesting angles of the American shipping question, some of them informative, others, I regret to say, most misleading and fal-lacious. It is of the latter that I propose to speak to-day frankly and dispassionately and without intent to offend those Senators who have put forward arguments I may question. The time has come, it seems to me, that the situation should be so clarified that there can be no question as to the issue. Believing this, I should be remiss in my duty as a Senator if I did not attempt to correct some of the many misapprehensions about the shipping bill, its purposes, and its probable effect upon the Nation at large.

It is a regrettable thing, Mr. President, that in our member-ship to-day we have not one single active shipping man. I doubt if that fact is known to the Senate, but, nevertheless, it is true that we have not one active shipping man amongst the membership of this body. Not one Senator, sir, can speak with the valuable first-hand information gained from actual shipping experience. We have our lawyers, our farmers, our bankers, our manufacturers, our business men, but not one shipping man. That fact alone is an important handicap in considering shipping legislation. Our great rivals on the seas, however, have in the British Parliament 41 actual shipping men as members. And I am informed that, officially connected with the British Government, there are more than 150 other shipping men lu the several departments that concern shipping. It is due to this reason, perhaps, that needed action to foster British shipping is readily obtainable abroad, no matter what move any other nation may make.

This condition is due to generations of neglect of our own merchant marine. Frankly our ship-minded people are in the minority, because this important branch of American industry never has received the Government aid it deserves on account of its relation to the welfare of the whole country. American shipping, fighting the hardest battle of all our industries, been compelled to fight that battle alone and unaided. has been the result? I need only point to the less than 10 per cent of overseas commerce carried by American ships in 1914 to provide the answer and to reiterate that out of the Senate membership of almost 100 there is not one shipping man.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair).

the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?
Mr. RANSDELL. I am delighted to yield.
Mr. CARAWAY. There are just about as good shipping men as is Mr. Lasker, whose advice we are asked to follow, and who himself testified that he did not know anything about running Mr. RANSDELL. That may possibly be. I have no doubt the Senator from Arkansas would be just about as capable of legislating in regard to shipping as Mr. Lasker is in regard to running ships, but Mr. Lasker, at least, tried his level best to do something, and I do not know of any effort the Senator from Arkansas has made to bring about the passage of legislation on this subject, which seems to me to be of colossal importance.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator another question. If the Senator from Arkansas had taken as much time in discussing the shipping bill as has the Senator from Louisiana-

Mr. RANSDELL. The fourth.

Mr. CARAWAY. And as the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones] has taken, there would not have been any time to pass the shipping bill or any other legislation whatsoever.

Mr. RANSDELL. Possibly not.
Mr. CARAWAY. There are 96 of us, and the Senator is making his fourth speech on that very question, all of them alike and prepared, and the Senator whom he is criticizingmyself-has not taken a minute on it.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have devoted a great deal of time, I will say, not alone on the floor of the Senate but outside, in committee and elsewhere, to try to assist in framing some sort of legislation on the subject. I will say to the Senator that the combined time of all my four speeches was not anything like as much as that consumed by a single speech made in opposition to the measure. I have not taken very much time.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator will pardone me, I am, of course, glad to hear him talk. He is always interesting and instructive.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator for the compliment, Mr. CARAWAY. I really wanted to get a vote on the matter, but as between the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Louisiana there has not been time to discuss anything or do anything except to listen to their speeches, four of the Senator from Louisiana and six of the Senator from

Mr. RANSDELL. If the Senator would listen carefully he would hear many things that would do him a lot of good,

Mr. CARAWAY. There is no question about that; but the trouble is the Senator from Louisiana is saying the same thing

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator may think so, but if he would read the speeches he would learn differently. I shall send copies of the speeches to the Senator, and will assure him there is a great deal that is new and a great deal of value in every one of them.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator a question. He is discussing the same facts. How does he get something new from the same facts?

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator must know that this shipping is a great big affair, one which cost upward of $3,000,000,000, an enterprise such as has been interesting mankind since Noah built the ark, the first ship of which we have any record. Shipping was an important business in all the world before we had highways, railways, airplanes, or anything of the kind. Shipping has been an art in all the ages. Recently we spent over $3,000,000,000 for ships to get our boys across the sea and to carry commerce to our allies. An asset of that value is far-reaching and comprehensive, and it takes time to cover it in a discussion of this sort. It can not be treated in a few minutes.

If the Senator will pardon me, I remem-Mr. CARAWAY. bered the fact that Noah built the ark, but I did not remember that he got a subsidy.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not know just what aid he got from on high.

Mr. CARAWAY. He got no cash subsidy, did he?
Mr. RANSDELL. But I imagine that the authority which told him to build that boat and to carry all those animals on it, two of each kind, encouraged him a great deal, and if it did not give him money it gave him something that was equivalent to money-an absolute monopoly in the shipping of the earth.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought the question of a subsidy was up, and I thought perhaps the Senator, who is such an authority on that question, might perhaps know.

Mr. RANSDELL. There are sometimes equivalents of a money subsidy. Noah enjoyed one of them-a monopoly of transport. If the Senator had been in the Chamber a while ago he would have known that I stated that I was very much in favor of a discriminating duty and would prefer it to direct The distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKel-LARI has a discriminating duty proposition; that is, it amounts to that. He does not call that direct aid, but a rose by any other name smells as sweet to me. If shipping is going to get money under the proposal of the Senator from Tennessee, we may go ahead and operate against our British rivals

Mr. McKellar. Oh, Mr. President— Mr. RANSDELL. Pardon me just a moment. If we could get a merchant marine under the discriminating duty proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], just as we got it in 1789 when we enacted our first discriminating duty law and built up a marvelous American merchant marine, which carried more than 90 per cent of all our commerce and a great deal of the commerce of other lands as well as our own, we could then go ahead notwithstanding our foreign rivals. now yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. In the first place, I want to say that the Senator is evidently mistaken in the purpose of my substitute, because it does not provide that the shipowners shall get anything at all out of the matter except cargoes at the usual rates. They get no subsidy, cash or otherwise. It is a mere aiding in the matter of getting business for the shipowners. ator complains that nobody on this side of the Chamber has offered another plan.

Mr. RANSDELL. A plan to build up shipping. Mr. McKELLAR. I shall ask unanimous consent to take a vote on my substitute, which the Senator says he indorses.

wonder if the Senator would object to that?

Mr. RANSDELL. As soon as I finish speaking, I shall not have any objection to that at all. The Senator occupied six or eight hours on the matter three or four days ago. His voice is mellifluous and sweet, and it was with a great deal of pleasure that I listened to him. I do not intend to take very long, and I would like to give expression to the few thoughts that I have on the subject

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield. Mr. CARAWAY. What I was getting at was that the Senator is taking the rest of us to task for not permitting the ship subsidy bill to be voted on, and here now he will not even give the Senator from Tennessee a chance to get unanimous consent to vote on his substitute until he-the Senator from Louisiana-can make his speech.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator is trying to place me in a false position. I had not taken very much of the time of the Senate until it had been demonstrated beyond the possibility of a doubt that the opponents of the shipping bill had succeeded in killing it. Then I thought I might say just a little bit before the funeral oration was actually preached by the Senator from Arkansas or some of the other opponents of the measure. wanted to say a few words before the sick man was actually dead. He is not quite dead yet, although I admit he is not far from it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought we set aside Sundays for pronouncing eulogies over the dead.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator will have a chance. I am going to finish in a very little while.

With the passage of the pending shipping bill, however, it is easy to see that in a few years there would be in America a competent shipping community and, with the bill in full operation, hundreds of active shipping men where there are only a few to-day. The far-reaching provisions of the shipping bill, with its mandate to foster new trade routes and new lines and to discourage monopoly in water transportation, promises to broaden the present limited shipping industry into a great national business, one that will rival our great railroads in the extent of commerce handled and bring to America its rightful share of its own ocean-carried commerce, with its annual reward of hundreds of millions of dollars.

It is said that we should hold our Government-owned ships until a better market for them could be obtained: shipping bill is passed no such market can be obtained, for the operating differentials against American ships will be just as existent five years from now, or even greater, as they are to-One of our southern Senators suggests that the ships be tied up in southern ports instead of northern harbors. I am from the South, but I would urge no such action, for it is a well-known fact that the warm southern waters deteriorate vessels of all kinds far faster than the cooler northern ports with their lesser marine growths. And while on this angle of holding our Government-owned ships indefinitely, let me say that a ship out of service-out of commission, I believe the seafarers call it-runs down far faster than one that is in constant use, well manned, and intelligently kept in repair. still another side of this that should be considered;

Our ships-the people's ships-are not being replaced as they wear out; instead, in its efforts at economy in repairs, the Shipping Board is compelled to withdraw run-down ships from service and use others from the reserve fleet. That can only result in one thing, the elimination of the fleet eventually. Mind you this is no criticism of the Shipping Board. That body of able men only is carrying out the expressed orders of the Congress to keep down operating losses as much as possible, orders emphatically given in the passage of the appropriation bills. Turn these ships over to private owners at world-market prices for tonnage, make up the operating differential by the direct aid; and we would see this Government-owned fleet, or the bulk of it, in the ocean-carrying trade earning hundreds of millions yearly for our citizens and being replaced from time to time with vessels of more modern design and of more economical type before a decade had passed.

One of my able friends on the other side has said that the policy of the shipping bill has been "overwhelmingly repudi-I must disagree with the Senator and would point out in justification of my belief the memorial presented to Congress few days ago, a memorial signed by representatives of the Nation's leading industries, many States and cities. I would point to the more than 200 resolutions passed by leading cham-bers of commerce and other commercial bodies in almost every State in the Union and would call the attention of Senators to the fact that not one commercial organization has gone on record against the shipping bill.

It also has been said that "three-fourths of the people" are against the bill. I must confess I can not see that when the business men of the country are so unitedly in favor of it, when American laboring men working on the sea go so far as to secede from the parent labor organization, and the representatives of American labor-not international labor, mind you-appear before the joint committee holding hearings on the bill and testify that they favor it. I can safely say that real American labor is for the shipping bill (the record shows that), but that international labor, as well as international finance and international politicians, are against it. It has been said that the farmers of this country stand 30 to 1, 40 to 1, even 60 to 1, against the bill, and so-called polls have been produced to prove this.

this connection an Ohio farm paper recently conducted a poll of its readers on this very question and the vote was 49,000 and odd in favor of the bill as contrasted with 84,000 and odd against, a mere matter of less than 2 to 1.

Much has been said about the low price the ships would bring after the bill is passed as compared with their original cost. Grant that. They would bring a comparatively small amount—10 per cent, or perhaps 20 per cent. But what other war material, bought at war prices, brought any more than that? In one or two scattering instances, perhaps, some articles sold for something near what the Government paid for them; but taking the average run of salvaged war material, I think it is safe to say that it has not realized a bit over 5 per cent. In the case of the ships it is wholly imperative that they be disposed of speedily, because their value lessens faster and faster each year they remain idle. Shipping men tell us, too, that the industry is in process of a great change, the Diesel engine supplanting the old reciprocating engine. This may be likened to the change from horse-drawn vehicles to automobiles. This parallel is especially apt, for the Diesel engine is an internal-combustion engine, with oll furnishing the power direct. Hundreds of our ships are capable of being transformed into Diesel-engined ships at once, but if we do not sell them to owners who will improve them this way the now stanch hulls will rust and they soon will be fit only for the junk dealer.

It has been sald that we would have ships sailing the ocean

It has been said that we would have ships sailing the ocean empty. I wish some one could tell me how this could happen under scaled payments provided in the bill. In respect to cargo carriers, it is estimated by the experts that the direct aid will barely cover the wage differentials. If the ship were to sail empty, who would be paying its coal bills? Not the American people under this bill, and certainly not the owner. No! This bill avoids just that very thing, and the American people are only asked to pay for what they will get; no more, no less—the equalizing of operating costs of American ships with their standards of American living, American wages, and American ideas of safety over the cheaper operating costs, with their lower standards of living, lower standards of wages, and lesser safety due to more lax requirements of foreign navigation laws and smaller crews, often of orientals.

There has been a great outcry that the direct aid would go to the Shipping Trust. The Shipping Trust. Where is it? Who is its head? From whence spring its octopuslike arms? I have studied American shipping for some time, and I have yet to find an American shipping trust. Our paltry tonnage in the overseas trade is scattered in ownership among threescore companies or individuals. Our pitifully small privately owned fleet in overseas commerce is fast being driven from the seas, as I pointed out to the Senate only recently, and unless aid comes to it quickly it will disappear forever.

Much to-do has been made about the passenger liners getting so much more under the shipping bill than do the cargo carriers of slow speed. Suppose they do. What of it? Why shouldn't they? A slow cargo boat, burning little coal and less oil, with few in its crew, costs little to run when compared with the swift passenger liner with its large crew, fuel costs mounting in arithmetical progression as each additional knot is added to its speed. A 12-knot vessel does not cost half as much to run as a 24-knot ship. We all know that, so it is only fair that some of the extra costs of having speedy ships be made up, for it is those speedy ships that we need the most in our American merchant marine. Every maritime nation in the world seeks to have speedy vessels in proportion to its cargo carriers, seeks to have speedy vessels in proportion to its carriers, so that the well-balanced fleet may carry a share of all its own business, freight and passenger. It is in the swift passenger ships that we are weak; hence the graded scales of payment according to speed. It can not be too strongly emphasized how vital these fast ships are to the national defense, more espe-cially since the naval treaty has been negotiated. More than once I have pointed out to the Senate that the 5-5-3 ratio would mean less than nothing to the United States unless we possessed an adequate fleet of fast liners comparable to the fleet now owned by Great Britain and being rapidly built by Japan. If for no other reason than this, the shipping bill should be passed, and I could not speak on this subject without again bringing this fact to the attention of the Senate,

Mr. President, on this subject I wish to say that I have especially inquired from several of the highest officials of the Shipping Board, including three of the commissioners and several of the most prominent experts. They all tell me that the bill is so framed in its direct-aid provisions as to equalize the increased cost of the fast vessel over the cost of operating the slow vessel by giving it a larger amount of pay; that, beyond question, no favoritism is shown to the fast vessels. They are put on terms of absolute equality, so far as the direct aid is concerned. As in that particular, there is great misconception on the part of very many people I take pleasure in correcting it.

In further explanation I ask to print in 8-point type as part of my remarks a letter on the subject from a prominent official of the Shipping Board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Interoffice memorandum.]

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD, February 12, 1923.

From: R. T. Merrill.

Subject: Justification of higher rate of subsidy for higher speeds.

The subsidy, as you stated, was designed to compensate for two differentials under which American ships suffer—(a) higher first cost, which is reflected each year in the carrying charges or capital charges; (b) higher wages paid to crew.

The subsidy was also designed to reflect the value of the ship to the Nation, and the measures of this value were taken to be (a) the activity of the ship, (b) her size, (c) her speed.

Laymen do not always grasp the cost of speed, not only in operation but in first cost. Careful tabulation was made of the cost of building ships to make different speeds, which resulted in the following table of cost per gross ton:

	gross ton.
10-knot cargo ship12-knot cargo liner	$120
15-knot combination liner	150
18-knot combination liner	325
20-knot and above express passenger liner	. 400 to 475

The owner pays from 15 to 20 per cent of his first cost in carrying charges each year—i. e., interest, insurance, and depreciation or amortization.

The formula finally decided upon after much scientific study of the matter with experts of the merchant service, naval architects, and officers of the Navy was as follows:

(Size) × (days at sea) × (speed)1.

As days-at-sea times speed-per-day equals distance covered, the formula was written:

(Size) × (distance) × (speed).

This formula gave the rate of change of compensation, or the curve of compensation rate. The actual amounts in the rate were determined by comparison with actual cases. These checked very closely.

checked very closely.

For example, bids were gotten in this country and abroad on the George Washington. It was found that the average of the bids differed by $1.875,000. Fifteen per cent of this—which would represent the annual excess carrying charge the American owner would have—is $281,250. The wage differential was $58,000, based on the same crew paid the British wages. The total handicap, then, for this type vessel would be $339,250. The subsidy for this size ship worked out $307,000 per year. In the case, for example, of the Resolute the first cost handicap was $195,000 per year and the wage differential $33,000, or a total of $228,000. Subsidy for this ship would have been, under the American flag, $210,000.

It is possibly not relevant, but as a matter of interest I compared our curve with that which was produced by the British Admiralty committee convened in 1902 to determine a proper rate of subsidy for British ships, and whose findings were the basis on which the Cunard subvention and loan which resulted in the construction of the Lusitania and the Mauretania were made. The rate of change of compensation per knot, or, in other words, the increase in the angle of tangency to the curve, was almost identical with our own. Naturally the actual amounts were lower than ours, because of the British costs of construction and wages. This merely checked, to my mind, the correctness of the different increments which we had allowed for the higher speeds.

I hope that this is the information that you desire, and, needless to add, I am entirely at your service if you wish something further along this line.

R. T. MERRILL, Director Bureau of Research.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, while on the subject of the relation of the shipping bill to foreign affairs there comes to my mind another phase that should have the most careful consideration. This is in relation to the British debt, and I wish to call attention to this fact in connection with it:

If we do not pass the shipping bill and by so doing permit the American merchant marine to sag back to the ignoble position it held in 1914, when we carried only one-tenth or less of our overseas trade, we will be making a virtual gift to England of the annual interest she is to pay us on our $4,600,000,000 war loan. Ocean freights paid in the fiscal year 1921-22 on American overseas cargoes aggregated $510,000,000. Britain's share of this totaled $170,000,000, or about one-third. With the elimination of the American merchant marine by failure to pass the shipping bill, it is safe to assume that Britain would resume her old position of carrying more than 60 per cent of our foreign Do a little figuring, Senators, and you will find that she will take from us in ocean freights another $136,000,-000 in addition to the $170,000,000 she got last year. The debt interest under the agreement is $138,000,000 annually for the next 10 years, so you can easily see we would be taking that amount from Great Britain with one hand and paying back to her in ocean carrying an almost equal amount.

That payment is only for ocean freights. It does not take into account the other items of the invisible trade balance Great Britain annually piles up against us, the money spent abroad by tourists, the money we pay in marine insurance, interest on investments here, and so on. Our old mother country is a wise old lady, and no doubt this possibility entered into her calculations for the future.

Previously I referred to the unanimous indorsement of commercial organizations of the shipping bill. I have before me, and ask that they be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, as an appendix to my remarks, the opinions of 18 prominent Americans on the shipping bill. These views were sent to the recent convention of the National Merchant Marine Association, held in this city on the 7th instant.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so

(See Appendix 2.) Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, seven of these expressions are from governors of widely scattered States; five are from members of the Cabinet, and the others are from such men as Henry J. Allen, former governor of Kansas; Gen. John J. Pershing, head of our Armies; Admiral W. S. Sims; Julius H. Barnes, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States; John E. Edgerton, president of the National Association of Manufacturers; and Charles M. Schwab, a man known to all

Mr. President, I desired to read to the Senate a statement I have here containing extracts from the press of several of the Southern States; but trust I may be permitted to print them with a very few running comments, without reading them, as an appendix to my remarks, in 8-point type.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair

hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See Appendix 3.)

Mr. RANSDELL. I will now conclude by asking permission to print as an appendix to my remarks a letter from Mr. Elliott Goodwin, resident vice president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, addressed to me, dated the 13th of this month. It is a reply to an article which appeared in the Con-GRESSIONAL RECORD some days ago, and referred in a rather critical way to the National Merchant Marine Association, of which I have the honor to be president. I ask that this be printed also in 8-point type.

(Paper by Senator WESLEY L. JONES of Washington, chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, read at the annual convention of the National Merchant Marine Association, Wednesday, February 7, 1923, Washington, D. C.)

There may be no farmers here to-day, but I want to discuss the shipping bill from the farmers' standpoint. I was raised on a farm. My people have been and are farmers. I have two small orchards, and everything I have to sell comes from the farm. If I have any selfish interest to serve it is the farming interest, and so I consider this question from the standpoint of the actual farmer. I am one of them in interest and association

Special appeals are made to the farmer to get him against the shipping bill. Why I do not know. It has seemed to me that they think the farmer less patriotic, more ignorant, and more swayed by prejudice than others. This is not so. No man is more genuinely American, no man is more generally intelligent, no man is more fair, just, and reasonable than the American farmer, and when he knows the situation and understands the bill and the purpose of it he will come as nearly forming a correct judgment of it as any set of men in the country. They tell him that it is framed to put money into the pockets of the wealthy shipowners. This is not true, and those who say it know it is not true. There are but a few present owners of American ships who will get any of this money, because there are but a few of them. About $4,000,000 of this money will go to present owners of American ships. It does not go to them as a profit. It goes to them to equalize the difference in the cost of running their ships with the cost of running the ships of their competitors. If we do not give it we may expect them to get less and less in number as they are now.

Most of it will go to men who will buy or build American ships and operate them in competition with already established foreign ships or lines. It will go to them not as profit, but to put them on an equality with their competitors. It will lead to American transportation instead of foreign transportation for the products of the American farm. What American farmer does not think that is a valuable thing to have? It is well worth the comparative small cost. Not only does it furnish him transportation at reasonable and stable rates, but it establishes shipyards furnishing employment to labor and a market for his products and the employment of capital and labor in many different ways.

A favorite charge is that this bill will aid the Shipping Trust and the subsidy will go to fill its coffers. They never name the trust. They never give its headquarters except at Wall Street. As a matter of fact there is no American shipping trust. There are a few large companies that own ships. They no doubt have interlocking directorates and in that sense may be called a trust. They almost wholly carry their own products in their ships and under the express terms of our bill would get none of the subsidy. We know the tonnage under the American flag. Its ownership is known, down to the individual ship.

There are 452 ships of 2,518,206 tons privately owned in the foreign trade. Of these there are 268 of 1,664,750 tons carrying oil in bulk or otherwise devoted exclusively to carrying cargoes owned by the owners of the ships. Under the shipping bill there would be no compensation paid on those ships. This leaves 104 vessels of 853,456 tons operating in the foreign trade. Of these 65 are passenger ships of 338,014 tons and 119 are cargo vessels of 515,442 tons. Forty-four of these passenger ships of 183,031 tons and 61 cargo ships of 180,568 tons are engaged in the West Indian and Caribbean trades, leaving passenger ships of 154,983 tons and 58 cargo ships of 334,874 tons engaged in the ocean overseas trade. But this is not all of these 65 passenger ships. Twenty-one of 99,383 tons and of the 119 cargo ships 31 of 162,538 tons are vessels owned by persons who use them largely for carrying products of their own. Assuming that these ships would be used to the of their owners, we have a total of 288,322 tons of passenger ships and 434,173 tons of cargo ships eligible to a subsidy under this bill, or 722,495 tons in all. This would take in round numbers $3,500,000 a year. extent of one-half of their capacity for carrying the products

Of the 17 overseas passenger ships, five belong to the International Mercantile Marine Co., on the North trans-Atlantic route; two belong to the Oceanic Steamship Co., now running between San Francisco and Australia and receiving a special postal pay or subsidy nearly three times what they would receive under this bill; two belong to the China Mail, running between San Francisco and the Orient; one belongs to Stephenidis and runs between New York and Constantinople; and the other four run between the Atlantic and Pacific ports for the Pacific Mail, but are considered foreign going because they touch at Mexican ports. From this it will be seen that our privately owned shipping in the foreign trade is small in

The United Fruit Co., the United States Steel Co., W. R. Grace & Co. are large owners of these ships, it is true. They may be more or less connected with each other. maintain their ships and do maintain them in competition with foreign ships largely because they carry the products of their other businesses. This bill is not for aid of these large companies, but it is intended to promote the establishment of new companies who will compete with these companies as well as with foreign companies. This bill is in the interest of smaller capital units in the shipping business. It is intended to give those who may want to go into shipping a fighting chance to compete in foreign trade.

It seems to me that this demonstrates to a mathematical certainty that there is no such thing as an American shipping trust that will be benefited by this bill. The shipping trusts of today are under foreign flags. They will benefit by the fallure to pass this bill. They hail with delight the opposition to it. Those who oppose this bill are fighting the battles of the foreign shipping trusts and placing at their mercy the American farmer and the American business man. It is done innocently, of course, but the results are none the less certain and dis To save a few dollars now for a few years they will put our farmers for years to come at the mercy of allen shipping that will take from him in carrying charges all the traffic will bear, all under the guise of friendship for the farmer. I want my farming interests saved from such friendship.

They say the farmer is opposed to a subsidy in principle. Official representatives of farm organizations say this. It sounds like the declaration of a Democratic platform. I can see how these men can speak for their Democratic members but they can not speak upon principle for their Republican membership. The Republican farmer, and there are millions of him, believes in the principle of protection to American industry. fundamental principle of this bill is the principle of protection and the application of it to the shipping industry, and the Republican farmer who opposes this bill because of opposition to the subsidy principle repudiates the formulation of his party

Now, I want to consider this measure from the standpoint of the farmer's selfish interest. I want to speak as one farmer to another

What instrument does the farmer need above all else? He must have cars to transport his products to the domestic market. If he can not get them, his crops waste away and he faces poverty and bankruptcy. His surplus crops seek foreign markets. These can be reached only by ships. If there are no ships there is no market for this surplus and this very fact reduces the market price for his whole surplus. If foreign ships alone are available to take his crops to market he must await their pleasure or convenience and he must pay such freight as they see fit to charge. If there must be any delay in getting to market he will suffer it, instead of his farmer competitor of the country that has the ships. If British ships are to serve American and British farmers and they are not sufficient to serve both promptly, who will be served first? The British farmer, of course. If special rates are needed to get a certain market, who will get those special rates? The British farmer, of course. I do not think that it is good for my interests as a Do you, my farmer neighbor, think it is good for you? I would rather have American ships, not only to keep the rates down, but also to give me a preference if a preference is needed either in prompt sailings or in special rates. Neighbor, do not you think so, too? Ponder this well. This is not all. I think that shipping is more important to me as a farmer than it is to anyone else. Why? Because of the character of farm products. If they can not be carried to market they rot and waste away. If there are no cars to take them to the domestic market they are soon a total loss. If cars carry to the port and there are no ships to carry them to market they waste away and my loss is a double one. If I were a miner I would lose by a lack of cars or ships for my coal, but I would not lose the coal because it would keep indefinitely. So, if I were a manufacturer, I might lose my market for a time but my product would keep. As farmers we need ships. Our interests will be better served by American ships. They can not be had under present conditions without some aid to equalize conditions for a time until we can establish ourselves in competition with a well-intrenched merchant marine. The profit to us will be many times the actual cost to us.

During the last 21 years we have exported farm products of the value of over $33,000,000,000. Foreign ships carried about $28,000,000,000 of it, leaving $5,000,000,000 for American ships. During the same period we imported farm products worth $21,000,000,000, of which over $17,000,000,000 was carried in foreign ships, leaving $4,000,000,000 for our ships. other words, during those 21 years alien ships carried $45,000, 000,000 worth of our agricultural commerce. It is estimated that the cost of such service under normal conditions would be from 5 to 15 per cent. Estimating it at 10 per cent, alien ships received $4,000,000,000 during that period for carrying that class of our foreign commerce.

These ships pay none of our taxes. They bear none of our burdens of local, State, or National Governments, nor can they be taken in case of a national emergency. They received for the services rendered over $190,000,000 a year. Estimating 10 per cent of this as a profit, they have been paid from the people of this country an actual subsidy of $19,000,000 a year, and our farmers and other citizens have borne all the burdens of Government, including those of a great war. Over $26,000,000,000 of this business has been done since the war began. The high rates which the people had to pay before American ships were built went largely to alien ships owned or controlled by great trusts, over which we had no control. If we had built a merchant marine our farmers and business men would have been saved hundreds of millions of dollars that went into the coffers of those foreign shipowners, and would have been saved hundreds of millions of tax burden in the State, and, in addition, much of this money would have been spent at home in the development of our interests and the employment of our own labor, thereby adding greatly to the domestic market for the farmers' products.

The farmers' grange is a fine organization. It has declared against a subsidy. It evidently favors an American merchant marine. How does it propose to get it? It says if our laws put our people at a disadvantage those laws should be repealed. As a farmer I would not stand for that any more than would the labor of the country, and my farmer neighbor would not either. What does it mean? It means substantially that we should not permit our ships to be manned with Chinese, Japanese, Hindus, Lascars, living under conditions that they accept and are used to. Does the grange really favor that? I do not think so.

We want a merchant marine.

The farmer, the business man, and the laborer agree in this. The measure we urge is a concrete proposal to establish what we all want. We will not pay out the money unless we get results. That is a certain fact that must not be overlooked. the payment of $30,000,000 is required, there will be 7,500,000 tons of ships flying the American flag and carrying the products of our farms, our mines, and our factories all over the world in an ever-expanding commerce.

APPENDIX 2.

OPINIONS OF PROMINENT AMERICANS ON THE NEED OF AN ADEQUATE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE READ AT THE ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE NATIONAL MERCHANT MARINE ASSOCIATION, WASHINGTON, D. C., FEBRUARY 7, 1923

Warren T. McCray, Governor of Indiana: "I am very much interested in the proposition of the merchant marine and am using what influence I have in that direction. I think it is highly important to the commercial interest and the general prosperity of the United States that this measure should carry."

Edwin P. Morrow, Governor of Kentucky: "I desire to express my sincere belief in the movement to establish a merchant marine and my faith in the attainment finally of the purposes of this movement. I believe in the capacity of America to hold its own in world trade with any land and on any sea. Once the great business of a merchant marine is put upon its feet and permitted to meet competitive conditions, American-made goods being carried in American ships under the American flag will move over the face of the waters of the world, and we will be in a position to meet economic and industrial conditions as they arise in the future. I believe most heartily and most earnestly in a merchant marine and in every reasonable plan to secure it."

John M. Parker, Governor of Louisiana: "It is a pity to see the greatest producing nation on earth dependent upon foreign bottoms for the transportation of our agricultural and manufactured products, and my personal judgment is strong that every possible effort should be made to assure a national merchant marine which would be a splendid investment and of untold value to agriculturist, producer, and manufacturer, and my sincere hope is Representatives, Senators, and the National Government will appreciate the benefits certain to accrue quickly to State and Nation by assuring transportation for our products.

E. Lee Trinkle, Governor of Virginia: "It is needless for me to say that, like all other Americans, I am intensely interested in having an adequate trade fleet under our flag. I hope this meeting may result in much good, and as a result of it our flag will be seen in many ports, carrying our products back and forth to all parts of the world."

Albert C. Ritchie, Governor of Maryland: "Every true American desires to know that the flag of his country sails on every sea. In the past, with a great continent awaiting development, it has been but natural that the ambitions of our youth and the minds of our business men should have been turned inland. The time now has come to look toward the sea.

"In my judgment the possibilities of profit will not alone accomplish the fine object you have in mind. We must develop a seafaring people, and prove them to be as efficient on sea as they have been on land. If I were to venture a suggestion to-day it would be to begin a campaign of education of our American youth in order to reawaken in them the leve of the sea. With thoroughly capable and efficient men to man and manage our ships many of the economic difficulties now in the way would be solved."

William D. Denney, Governor of Delaware: "I am heartily in sympathy with the American merchant marine movement, and you have my best wishes for its success."

Charles R. Mabey, Governor of Utah: "President Harding said recently, in referring to aviation, 'The history of civilization is largely the history of communication.' This is true, then, of every form of transportation. It is therefore palpable that the United States should spare no effort to retain the volume of shipping which is her just portion and constantly endeavor to keep her ranking position among the great nations of the world in commerce and navigation."

Henry J. Allen, former Governor of Kansas: "We of the Middle West are interested in good roads-in transportationfor we realize that without transportation our products are practically worthless.

Inasmuch as a healthy foreign market is essential to American farm and commercial prosperity, we realize that our highways must extend out over the plains to the sea and over the sea to foreign shores.

The Federal Government in times past has found it necessary to grant aid to farmers in the form of the homestead law, reclamation projects, irrigation enterprises, and other valuable and constructive things. It has granted aid to the railroads and paved roads, since farms without railroads and highways would be dead and unproductive property. It seems to me, therefore, that we ought to take the next necessary step and grant encouraging aid to the merchant marine which travels the extended highways of the Middle West out across the seas. This policy seems all the more advisable since the granting of this aid would actually reduce the expenses of the Federal Government by eliminating the burden now imposed by the maintenance of Government ships.

I believe that before long the majority of the people of this section will come to a full realization of the necessity of keeping an American merchant marine on the high seas and will rally to the support of this clean and legitimate project which means so much to the ultimate prosperity of the whole Nation."

Charles E. Hughes, the Secretary of State: "I greatly regret that the demands of the department are such that I can not attend the convention of the National Merchant Marine Assoclation. It gives me pleasure to comply with your request for a brief word with respect to the essential national interest involved in the maintenance of a national merchant marine.

"I do not see how anyone can be blind to this interest. adequate merchant marine effectively maintained would not only promote the commerce but would support the influence and prestige and constitute a bulwark of the safety of the Nation. It would testify to the national capacity in one of the most important spheres of human endeavor with which initiative, hardiness, enterprise, and the ultimate resources of national strength and distinction have always been associated. It is a sphere of effort to which we are called by our seafaring traditions of the past, our extensive coasts, our enormous capacity for production, and our vast foreign trade.

"The question now before us is not whether we should enter upon this activity but whether we should abandon it. We now have a great merchant fleet at our command and an unprecedented national opportunity. To forego this opportunity would be a great national misfortune. It would be to confess in-competency and to make an abject surrender. The question is simply whether American enterprise is equal to this task with a fleet which awaits its bidding. The question is reduced to a practical one of method, and this has received the most competent expert attention in the formulating of the measure which is now before Congress. I believe that this proposal to maintain a national merchant marine deserves, and I trust it will have, the support of your association.

Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury: "All patriotic Americans wish to see our country restored to her rightful place on the sea, and I, for one, have an abiding faith that American genius and energy will find a way to build up and maintain a real American merchant marine."

John W. Weeks, Secretary of War: "Human progress has been possible largely through development of commerce, and to-day transportation is one of the vital needs of society. equally important to all professions and trades. For a nation to endure with success through the disruptions of war and the competition of peace demands that it be able to retain effective control over its essential commerce on sea as well as on

"We have been taught many times that we can not with impunity neglect our own merchant marine. A most recent lesson in this respect threatened the defeat of our purposes in the World War. A continuation of such neglect would perpetuate the danger of humiliation and defeat for our aspirations and our ideals. We would face this danger not only as a participant in war but also in the preservation of neutrality during wars in which we were not involved and yet during which we must maintain our foreign trade relations.

"It was with my deep regret that I declined an invitation to attend the annual convention of the National Merchant Marine Association. I desire to emphasize my assurance that your proceedings will command my closest attention. It is my hope and belief that your discussions will bear the fruit of success for your purposes."

Hubert Work, Postmaster General: "I realize the desirability of encouraging and fostering an American merchant marine, and I hope that your meeting will be successful from every stand-

"Our policy in the Post Office Department is to provide for the transportation of our mail on ships of American registry, except when the holding of mail for such ships would seriously delay its expeditious move abroad.

"In addition to this preference in the matter of allocation of our foreign-mail traffic, we also pay to the American steamers carrying our mail abroad more than twice as much money per pound as we pay to foreign steamers rendering the same service. The extent to which we in the Post Office Department favor American shipping is best reflected in the figures for the past fiscal year, which show that we have paid to American-owned shipping companies $4,034,719, while during the same period we only paid to foreign-owned shipping lines $1,858,191."

Edwin Denby, Secretary of the Navy: "Domestic industrial needs, overseas trade expansion, and naval requirements, as well as a strong sentimental impulse, all tend to make necessary the creation of a merchant marine to carry the American flag and show the peoples of the earth the outward symbol of our strength and commercial greatness. I am one of those who has always stood for Government aid to shipping for the sake of the whole country, and I still earnestly believe in such aid."

James J. Davis, Secretary of Labor: "If the United States is to retain its exalted position among the nations of the world. it must continue to have its flag carried into the foreign ports of the seven seas. The activities of the National Merchant Marine Association should for this reason have the support of every American in its efforts to build up the American merchant

"Through the State Department we maintain a corps of ambassadors, ministers, and consuls in all parts of the civilized world. We are proud of this fine set of representative Americans and their achievements abroad. Yet the real contact between the American industrial and commercial interests-and we pride ourselves upon the excellence of these institutionsand those of foreign nations is most often made effective by those who carry our flag across the seas and wave it at the doors of maritime nations.

'America, too, boasts of its high state of civilization, its high standard of citizenship, and the excellence of the institutions which are a part of its ideal of comfort and happiness for in-The standard for the American seamen, their working conditions, their hours and wages should be representative of the ideals we maintain at home. Unless the life and work of American seamen can be made as attractive as the average vocation within our territorial limits, we can not expect to attract the worth-while representative youth of the country to follow the sea and carry our flag with honor into the far corners

"Every ship is an envoy and every member of its crew an ambassador carrying the message of American standards and efficiency to the commercial interests abroad. It is just as important that this corps of American agents be truly representative of America as that our diplomatic emissaries be of the highest type of American manhood and citizenship.

"I trust that Congress will soon devise some method of insuring that our merchant marine continue honorably to carry the Stars and Stripes into every port of the globe."

Gen. John J. Pershing, United States Army: "Your invitation for me to participate in the convention of the National Merchant Marine Association is very much appreciated, and it is a matter of genuine regret that I can not accept.

"On several occasions recently I have strongly urged the necessity for developing an adequate American merchant marine in discussing the national defense. The latter is the issue to which my official position and my lifelong service dedicate my support and championship. For this reason I do not feel free to make a special issue of any other question, much as I deplore the tragedy of our present position on the high seas among the nations of the world."

Admiral William S. Sims, United States Navy: "In my capacity as a naval officer, my interest is naturally first a mill-tary one, and the more so because, as a commander of our naval forces in Europe during the Great War, I, of course, realized very keenly that the question of cargo ships was of no less than vital importance; that the chief mission of the allied and associated navies was to afford those essential vessels the maximum possible protection; and that the success of the armies depended upon continuously maintaining adequate sea lanes of communi-

"Had the flow of supplies over these lanes been interrupted or the available tonnage reduced below that necessary to sustain the armies and the civil populations of the Allies, no conceivable military force could have saved our cause from defeat, since no navy or no army, however powerful, can operate against an enemy without adequate and continuous supplies amounting to many thousands of tons a day; and when the bulk of those supplies are of necessity sea borne, the imperative need of merchant shipping in war is apparent.

"We all depended for these supplies largely upon the shipping of the Allies. Had we been alone in a war against a powerful enemy, we would have been fatally handicapped by our lack of shipping. It follows that if our present merchant marine is allowed to disappear through deterioration, the aggressive power of our fleet must disappear with it, for under these conditions it could no more carry out war operations than an army could advance against an enemy without railroads and motor lorries continuously supplying its necessities; it could not proceed beyond half its steaming radius from its land bases of supply; it would be nailed down to our coast. The interdependence of the navy and the merchant marine in war is com-

"As for the necessity for a merchant fleet for trade purposes, it would seem that from a purely economic point of view there could be no doubt of its advantages to our country. lions of freight on our increasing exports must be paid to shipping. Quite independently of the difference between foreign and domestic freight charges, it would seem apparent that at least a reasonable proportion of this great sum should be expended in the country in maintaining and developing our own ocean carriers and our shipbuilding and its allied industries.

"Every manufacturing city in the United States is in reality a seaport in the sense that its exports must flow to and across the sea, and all are directly interested in any measures that will enable them to send their cargoes to their foreign destinations under the most favorable conditions."

Julius H. Barnes, president Chamber of Commerce of the United States: "The greatest trading Nation in the world today must depend on foreign carriers for its transportation to its Maintaining at home a wage scale and a overseas customers. standard of living higher than its world competitors, but protected by tariff imposts, it nevertheless expects that standard of wage and of living to compete on the open seas against lower standards, which produce lower operating costs. It is illogical, and the failure of this policy is being demonstrated month by "A surplus-producing country ourselves, and particularly raising annually a surplus of grain, the agricultural community should, in its most intelligent self-interest, favor the establishment of an American fleet with every facility for lifting the export surplus from our market so that it will not unduly depress as well the home market, which, because of its own pro-tection on a higher standard of living, is well able to pay profitable farm prices.

There is, besides, the broad question of encouraging the creation and maintenance of privately owned American fleets available in time of emergency. It is inconceivably dangerous that in the event of war we must largely depend on foreign carriers to transport our own troops and supplies.

Every proper encouragement should be extended to equalize the unfair competition against American carriers in the open ocean routes.

John E. Edgerton, president National Association of Manufacturers: "Transportation has built the world; it has built the United States. It does the pioneering; it makes great production possible; it produces and sustains prosperity.

"Just as our railroads have pioneered for industry throughout our great Nation, so our American merchant marine-our railroads across the sea-must pioneer for American industry in the markets of the world.

"Our greatest prosperity will come when our complete production is consumed, and that will be when our surplus goods are being bought fully in the large consuming countries of the world. Our foreign trade is slowly recovering its pre-war level and soon must develop to even a higher level because of the impetus given it by the war.

"We should have an adequate merchant marine sufficient to meet the present needs and gradually expanding commensurate with out overseas trade. Under the restrictions of our present laws the American shipper is at a disadvantage in competition with the shippers of other nations. Our Government must give real aid to our shipping, just as other foremost nations have done, whether that aid be in the form of more liberal laws, bounties, bonuses, or a flat subsidy. The manufacturers believe that in the present emergency of a deteriorated merchant marine the Government should grant a subsidy, but that such subsidy should definitely provide for a proper return to the Government after a reasonable profit has been made by the shipping companies.

"Unless our Government takes a definite interest in its merchant marine, supports it, and backs it up with determination in every quarter of the globe, we shall always be subject to unequal competition in delayed cargoes, port complications, and discriminations that are bound to be imposed, intentionally or otherwise, when our producers are forced to ship in vessels of another country."

Charles M. Schwab, chairman Bethlehem Steel Corporation: Unfortunately, I will be in Europe at this time, but if you have the opportunity I wish you would convey to the members of your association my best wishes for success in their efforts to place the merchant marine of this country on a sound and profitable basis.

I am convinced that a strong merchant marine is essential to the business prosperity of the country. This country has attained a foremost position in business and industry throughout the world, and there is no reason why we should be compelled to have our merchant ships built in foreign shipyards and our manufacturing products and other goods shipped under foreign flags.

To abandon our merchant marine at the present time would be disastrous, to say the least. It would throw out of work thousands of trained men skilled in the art of shipbuilding, who would have to commence anew to learn other trades.

"Hundreds of shipyards, built up at a cost of millions of dollars, will have to be scrapped. But by far the greatest injury would come to our country in placing our foreign commerce in the hands of our foreign business rivals. For this is certain to happen if this country is compelled to ship its goods under foreign flags.

"Nor is there any doubt in my mind that the same American enterprise and aggressiveness, which have made this country the workshop of the world, will soon place our shipping and shipbuilding on a profitable basis, and a basis which will mean increased prosperity to the country, if our shipping interests receive the same cooperation from our Government that the merchant marine of other countries receive from their governments.'

APPENDIX 3.

I DEMOCRATIC PRESS ON THE SHIPPING BILL.]

If the Democratic press of the South properly reflects the sentiment of that section, and they are in intimate contact with their Democratic readers, a strong sentiment exists in the South for the bill, for leaders in southern press opinion have been vigorous in their advocacy of the measure.

Taking first my own community, the three Democratic newspapers of New Orleans I know are earnestly for this measure; and these New Orleans papers are among the leaders of editorial thought in the South. The Times-Picayune does not hesitate to say that it hopes "the Democratic Senators will not fall into the obstructionist pit that the hostiles on the majority side have digged for their own feet"; further saying that the bill "should be permitted to go to final vote with a reasonable promptness. And unless some better plan is presented for development of an American merchant marine on a permanent footing, it seems to us that sound and constructive statesmanship counsels congressional consent to a test of the plan proposed by the administration." The Times-Picayune is very clear in its editorial opinion as to the marine bill being a national rather than a party question when it says, "the issue is not one of the kind that should be fought out upon party lines." The Times-Picayune says that discussion on the merits will be helpful but that "the attempt to force partisan line-ups and to 'play' politics with a question of greater national importance than many of us realize should be discouraged by thoughtful citizens." Among the editorials in the Times-Picayune they touch upon the obligation of the party, saying that "Unless the party has a sound and defensible alternative course to offer, their undertaking to destroy the plan presented by the administration will impress open-minded observers as bad statesmanship."

The New Orleans Item in a thoughtful editorial touches concretely upon the economic effect, and after reciting the experience of the southern section as a result of artificial discrimination the Item says that if the Government surrenders "control of the movement of this vast commerce, represented in the products of the Mississippi Valley, at the sea line, then we surrender our assurance that it will not be taken from us under stress of war or under stress of that competition in peace time." Item says, "We must keep the flag on the seas, that the farms be kept prosperous, the mines and factories busy, the boats moving on the waterways, the trains upon the railroads, and the trucks and wagons on the country roads"; closing the editorial by saying it is the duty of the southern people "to see that all Members of the House and Senate at Washington from the Southern States support the proposed shipping measure.

The New Orleans States, whose publisher has been widely identified as an aggressive member of the Democratic Party, says that "In a situation such as now confronts the Nation individual Democrats ought not to be held to rigid obedience to party tenets. A real emergency exists, and it ought to be met as best accords with national interests. As a hidebound Democratic paper the States does not hesitate to say that patriotism must rise above party policies." Realizing the importance of this issue as a nonparty measure and saying that it speaks as a party newspaper, the States says that the Democratic Party "owes a patriotic duty which the lessons of the war seem to impose on Americans," the States being for a subsidy "because only thereby can the American flag be kept on the seas and the Republic be provided with essential marine reserves for national

The States, after asking the question, "Do we want to go back to the old conditions under which foreign flags dominated our foreign commerce?" proceeds to make answer to that by saying it does not believe "any American does. Yet it is inevitable that this will be the consequence of our failure, at least temporarily, to pass the subsidy bill." The States, speaking as a strictly party journal, asks of the Democrats in Congress, "What is going to be their excuse if for the want of governmental support the American flag disappears from the seven seas? Is the party to take the responsibility of destroying about the only asset which came to us from the war? the subsidy is not passed, we shall ultimately see the marine we developed out of the war completely dissipated and the American flag disappear from the seven seas. It would be a matter for profound regret that the Democratic Party, under whose administration we once possessed the greatest merchant fleet in the history of the world, should take the reactionary position of opposing this subsidy on grounds which once but in this emergency do not presently exist."

No one can question the democracy of the newspapers in the Texas, such as the San Antonio Express, the El Paso Herald, the Galveston Tribune, and the Fort Worth Record, papers that are not only published on the seaboard but in the interior. The San Antonio Express, referring to the charge that the subsidy would cost a large sum of money, makes the ironical statement that this is "frightful! But before the war what was the annual cost of carrying 91 per cent of American exports and imports in foreign bottoms?" The Express does not hesitate to state unequivocally that "Congress should heed President Harding's advice and pass the ship subsidy bill promptly, as it is the only way to insure that 50 per cent of import and export trade shall be carried in American ships. Otherwise foreign craft will drive them from the seas."

The El Paso Herald sees in the situation a fear that the fleet may pass into foreign hands, and says that "this is a real danger. Our ships can not compete without a subsidy, even as many foreign lines are subsidized."

The Fort Worth Record, a paper of large circulation and influence, insists that the issue should be approached "from a national and economic angle," which it indicates is not the angle with which some of the Texas Representatives approach the question, for the Fort Worth Record says that Texas delegation in Congress is inclined to play politics rather than face the issue on its merits." The Record does not lay this blame altogether on the Democratic Members from Texas, but says that "many of the Republican majority are doing the same thing," proceeding further to say: "That is equally against the public interest. Facing the matter as one of business and common sense, Congress should either provide a better plan or play ball."

The Galveston Tribune, published in one of the great ports of the Gulf, points out one very elemental thing when it says that "one dominating fact appears to have been largely overlooked in arguing against the subsidizing of an American merchant marine, and that is the proposition is not one for helping any particular individual or body of individuals but is for the good of the entire Nation. The people want a merchant marine, they demand it, and in offering a subsidy as a means to an end the suggestion is one way in which it can be brought into active service."

Another one of the Gulf States which is keenly interested in port development and a merchant marine is the great State of Alabama. Last November the voters of that State voted the immense sum of $10,000,000 for the construction of ship terminals at Alabama's only seaport, Mobile. This vote of the people was so overwhelmingly in favor of this port development that the vote against it was negligible. This indicates the interest of the people of Alabama in the movement of Alabama commerce in American ships for the protection of the Alabama cotton farmer and manufacturer. They want an open gateway to the sea and they stand behind their desire by the huge sum of $10,000,000 to develop port facilities at their only seaport. Published at the capital of Alabama is a newspaper, the Montgomery Advertiser, which is widely quoted. It is a stanch Democratic newspaper, but it does not hesitate to say that "It seems to be a simple solution of the problem facing the administration in disposing of the fleet of ships and in obtaining by private ownership and operation a mercantile fleet under the American flag which will be an adjunct to the Navy, if war should again confront the Nation, and also supply the vital necessity of extending American trade throughout the world in time of peace.

The Birmingham News, published in a city destined to be one of the great cities in the Central South and whose policy is vigorous for progress, says that "The question of subsidy no subsidy actually is reduced to this: Have Americans pride enough and business sense enough to want to deliver the goods sold to Europeans and Asiatics in our own boats?

The News shows discriminating judgment and utters a wholesome truth when it says that the bill " is a matter of business strategy, of investment to safeguard our future development in world markets. And to those who may object to the idea of a ship subsidy it is only necessary to refer to the building of the great transcontinental railroads, when princely grants of the public domain and bonds of cities, counties, and States were voted the projects in order to help get them functioning, to reap the tremendous interest the country has obtained later in the way of development and general wealth. The situation is much the same to-day as regards the merchant marine. If we do not lend a strengthening arm our young merchant navy can not float alone; if we abandon the seas to our rivals it will come back to us in cold smokestacks and furnaces and closed-down manufactories for lack of foreign outlet at a fair chance.

The Birmingham Age-Herald, the Mobile Register, and the Mobile News-Item-one published in the great industrial city of Alabama and two published in the only port of that State— are newspapers controlled and directed by Frederick I. Thompson, the commissioner on the United States Shipping Board from the Gulf division. Therefore it could be expected that these newspapers would stanchly support the pending marine bill, for Mr. Thompson's position, as a Democrat, in advacacy of this bill is as well known as is such advocacy of the measure by the other two Democrats on the board-former Senator George E. Chamberlain, of Oregon, who served with such distinction in this body, and Admiral W. S. Benson, of Georgia, who made a dis-tinguished and enviable record during the World War. It can be asserted that the belief of these Democrats in this bill is one born of conviction and study of this question, and not from any thought of their political position, for the intention of Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Thompson to voluntarily retire as commissioners of the Shipping Board, regardless of the fate of this bill, is well known.

The Birmingham Age-Herald says that "It would be folly for this Nation to come into position where, with great and costly cargoes to export, it must be at the mercy of foreign steamship lines which may be controlled by competitors in the world's markets, for rates made by the foreign competitor could alone be made to ruin our commerce. Therefore the producing centers, above all others, have their welfare at stake. We have not yet forgotten how tragically we were made to realize during the war the fact that a merchant fleet is an indispensable adjunct of the Navy. The very safety of this Nation may depend upon what action Congress now takes on this pivotal question."

The Age-Herald cites particularly the actual situation with respect to the movement of cotton from Alabama and shows how beneficial an American merchant marine would be to the Alabama cotton planter through the fact that formerly the Alabama cotton planter on export movement from the cotton farms was at the mercy, as to steamship rates, of the British interests, which was as much the interests of the British spinner as the British steamship operator, saying that "It is conceivable that under a combination of the British spinner and the British steamship operator the farmers of Alabama could be penalized in the movement of their export cotton from the port of Mobile, which is now guarded against in the service rendered the Gulf by American flagships, and which protection should be continued, but which can only be continued through the subsidy bill unless the Government would embark on a policy of Government operation in perpetuity, a policy not consonate with the merchant marine act, 1920."

The Age-Herald in a subsequent editorial touching upon the local benefits that would accrue to the State of Alabama says that "It is imperative and to the national advantage that this question come to a vote and that the vote be favorable."

The Mobile Register, a newspaper that in its entire life for more than 100 years has stood unflinchingly for the Democratic Party, says that "Unless the measure is approved, there will continue for some time a direct levy for the maintenance of the fleet. Therefore, the subsidy offers a business way out of shipping." The Register further says, "To cry 'subsidy!' is no argument. The questions are: Do we want American goods to be carried in American ships? Do we need American ships to serve as transports and naval auxiliaries if we are again compelled to go to war? If the answer is yes, then the merchant marine bill must be passed and our merchant fleet given a helping hand. The fact remains that if we want the ships we must encourage private ownership. On the face of it, the proposition looks good business, and there may be cause to regret that the only piece of broadly national and nonpartisan legislation the Republicans have brought forward under this administration is being opposed by the Democratic minority and what appears to be filibuster tactics are being directed against this measure." The Register, speaking as a member of the Democratic Party organization, says that "The Democratic Party must meet the issue of an American merchant marine with the same true courage that is exhibited by the President, whose program is that the present measure be adopted unless its opponents submit a better measure. Certainly there should be no delay in reaching a decision. The alternative is, as the President well says, one of national humiliation.

The Mobile News Item, also a Democratic journal, says that "There is but one common-sense course open. The need of the hour and the duty of Congress is adoption of the merchant marine bill, so that the way can be paved for a privately owned American merchant marine that will compare favorably and compete equally with the ships of any other nation."

In Georgia, another State with several important ports, is published a newspaper whose journalistic achievements is known to every Senator in this Nation, and that newspaper is the Atlanta Constitution, whose editor, Mr. Clark Howell, is a Democratic national committeeman from the State of Georgia and everywhere recognized as one of the influential members of his party. The Constitution says that the measure "is a reconstruction problem, and should be appraised carefully and broad-mindedly as such. And whatever may be the views of any individual member of the Senate, to be expressed by his vote, under the circumstances certainly there can be no justification for deliberately blocking a fair vote simply to play politics." The Constitution further says "The pending bill is intended to cure an economic problem, and it should not become a political football."

The Atlanta Georgian points out that "Democratic newspapers, Democratic organizations, and individuals have urged it"; and the Georgian in vigorous language asks "Who is it behind the lot of propaganda against the bill?" and seems to give the answer when it says that "You will find the source to be the Anglo-New York papers, which are the voice of the house of Morgan." "Why does Morgan want the American ship subsidy bill defeated?" asks the Georgian. "Because Morgan has bet on the British merchant marine. His 'American' International Mercantile Marine Co. has 12 per cent of its tonnage under the American flag, 88 per cent under the British flag. Morgan doesn't want American steamers to take away the millions of freight money which his British ships are earning in carrying our exports. Morgan is the shipping agent—as he is the fiscal agent—of the British Government to America."

in America."

Farther up the south Atlantic seaboard is North Carolina, and one of the leading papers in that State is the Charlotte Observer. The Observer says that "under the plan proposed we are to have an American marine in the best sense of the word," closing with the expression that "it is going to be a great day for the country when our merchant marine is restored to its ancient prestige."

At Richmond. the historic capital of the Confederacy, the Times-Dispatch, a leader in thought and southern journalism, says that "The continued existence of a disposition on the part of Democrats in Congress to oppose the plan of Government aid, principally on the ground of traditional prejudice against any form of subsidy, has operated for more than 50 years to deprive America of a merchant marine. It seems that the wiser policy for the Democrats to pursue would be to give support to the President's plan," the Times-Dispatch closing its editorial with the statement that "The Democratic minority faces a great opportunity to render effective service for the common good."

The Times-Dispatch in another editorial says that "If the mercantile fleet is to be kept alive it must be subsidized for a few years at all events; there seems to be no escape from this." The foregoing expression was from a newspaper published in the interior.

Senators know the high position of Norfolk and Newport News in the ports of the United States. The Norfolk Ledger-Dispatch says that "The country is confronted with a necessity which can not be met in any other way than by a subsidy, The Nation's commerce and the national defense both demand it"; the Dispatch going further and saying that "It is easy to understand the opposition to the principle of subsidies; it is not difficult to understand the opposition to this proposed subsidy, though the Ledger-Dispatch believes the arguments supporting it are convincing, even in the face of the arguments opposing it." "But it is beyond our understanding," says the Dispatch, "at least, how a majority of Democrats can bring itself to say to a minority of Democrats no matter how small a minority: 'You shall not vote for this bill, no matter what you believe will be the consequences to the country of its rejection, because we have decided it is not good party politics for Demo-crats to vote for it." "Unless we do grant a subsidy in some form," says the Ledger-Dispatch, "we must prepare for the time when the seas will be swept clean of our merchantmen, when our commerce will be hampered, and when our Navy will be crippled. We need an American merchant marine to meet the demands of our commerce and to fulfill the requirements of national defense." Speaking directly against the rumor that there would be an effort to delay a vote on the bill, the Ledger-Dispatch says that while discussion is good "there comes a time when discussion is not for the purpose of information but for obstruction."

The Newport News Press says that newspaper is "opposed to any Government aid to private enterprise," but that it had "given the question of the merchant marine careful study and it has become a conviction that it is as truly a necessity of this Republic as a navy. So believing, we are for the most practicable way, whatever that may be, to secure for the United States a merchant marine adequate to all our demands and capable of competing with the ships of the world on the high seas." The News Press further says that "Objections are raised to the only bill in Congress to ald American shipping, but no other means of relief is even proposed. The opponents of the bill offer nothing to save the merchant marine from wreck."

In the building of the great industrial South one of the chief exponents of that section's progress has been the Manufacturers Record, of Baltimore. That publication has been a conservative force fighting for the industrial and commercial development of my section. It perhaps would be proper to close this summary of what leading newspapers of this Democratic section think of the pending bill with an editorial from the Manufacturers Record. I have attempted here to reflect southern sentiment as indicated by their chief journalistic spokesmen. But I have been unable to gather all expressions that have been in favor of this bill.

Under the heading "Why the South should favor subsidy for an American merchant marine," the Manufacturers Record says:

"Of all sections of this country the South preeminently should be active and aggressive in favor of the development of an American merchant marine, and this can only be brought about by an adequate subvention or subsidy to American ships. The South has three-fifths of the coast line of the United States; it has vast potentialities for the development of foreign commerce. For the fiscal year 1921 the total exports through southern ports amounted to $2,294,000,000, which largely exceeded the total value of exports from the United States for any year prior to 1913 and were nearly double the total value of foreign exports for the entire country as late as 1900. For the same year the value of imports at southern ports amounted to $391,489,000, giving a total commerce in and out of over $2,800,000,000. The exports from five leading southern customs districts for that year amounted to $1,867,000,000, as compared with a total of $356,000,000 from the entire Pacific coast. The exports, for instance, from Galveston for that year were $550,000,000 or nearly 000,000 more than the total exports for the entire Pacific The exports from New Orleans that year were $614,-000,000, or nearly four times the total exports from San Francisco, or $240,000,000 more than the combined exports from San Francisco, Los Angeles, and San Diego. These figures, startling as they are, as indicative of the enormous expansion at southern ports, are merely suggestive of the possibilities of foreign commerce through these ports. They do not, of course, include the enormous coastwise commerce to and from all the southern ports. They merely serve to show what the South is beginning to do in the way of exporting its own products through its own ports and how the West is also seeking an outlet through the South. Every dollar of foreign trade through southern ports is an argument in favor of the development of our own merchant marine.

'It seems scarcely conceivable that the people of this country, with its resources so boundless as to stagger the mind, with a growth already great enough to give us one-half of the world's railroad mileage, one-half of the world's coal and iron and steel output, with other things in proportion, should for one moment be satisfied to permit our flag to be driven from the "' Commerce follows the flag,' is an old saying as true to-day as when uttered. Unless our flag floats in all the ports of the world the respect for it will be lessened on the part of other nations, and our power to command the trade of other countries will be greatly decreased. The ships of every other nation give first attention to the trade of their own people regardless of all denials which may be made by foreign shipowners. As a German steamship line some years ago in fighting the efforts of this country to develop a merchant marine was found by congressional investigation to be carrying on its pay roll a Washington agent of one of the leading press associations in order to mislead the public as to the need of an American merchant marine, so influences of many kinds are at work to-day to mislead the people of the country and to fill many newspapers with propaganda, the origin of which some of them do not themselves understand, against the necessity of a subvention for the up-building of a merchant marine. Without a merchant marine this Nation would lose many of its commercial potentialities and would be, in time of peace and in time of war, at the mercy of other countries, and its flag would be despised by the peoples of many nations because it did not have the courage to see that the Stars and Stripes floated in every port and on every sea.

"The South, of all sections, should unite in favor of legis-lation for the maintenance of American shipping against the foreign shipping interests, which are vigorous and aggressive in trying to prevent the passage of such a measure.'

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Washington, D. C., February 13, 1923.

Hon. Joseph E. Ransdell, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Dear Senator: An article was, according to the Record, read in the Senate yesterday which, in attacking the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, lugged in the organization of which you are president, the National Merchant Marine Association, by the ears. Of course, you and your organization had nothing to do with chartering a ship, American or British, to carry delegates of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States on a trip to the principal ports of the Mediterranean and then landing them in Naples in time for the general meeting of the International Chamber of Commerce—I doubt if you ever heard of it-but in placing the position of the National Merchant Marine Association in its proper light before the Senate, I would ask you, in fairness to this organization, which has no representative in the Senate, to have this letter read in answer to what was presented yesterday.

The article accuses the Shipping Board of stating "rank nonand the Chamber of Commerce of the United States with "inconsistency."

Out of the mussy thought of this statement one is able to work out a presumption that it was intended to criticize the national chamber for supporting (as it has been supporting) whole-heartedly the ship subsidy bill while at the same time members of this chamber sail on a mission on a British ship.

Here is the alleged "inconsistency," in spite of the fact that the author states that he was informed by an official of the Shipping Board that they did not have a ship available. declared to be "rank nonsense," because "Great Britain always has a ship available where there is any business," and attention is called to the fact that "the Shipping Board has hundreds of ships tied up and idle."

The statement of a few facts is all that is necessary

First, the Shipping Board has no passenger ships tied up, except several that could only be put in condition at an excessive expenditure that the board has not felt justified in incurring, and passengers are not carried on freight ships.

Second. The Shipping Board has but few passenger ships, anyway, in comparison with foreign fleets. The "hundreds of referred to in the article, constst of 97 per cent of cargo ships. To be exact, the Shipping Board has 40 passenger ships, both in and out of commission, and 1,324 cargo ships.

Third. Not a Shipping Board passenger ship has gone to the Mediterranean this season, nor since the early part of 1922, and the Shipping Board is not in the touring or cruising business.

Fourth. The Chamber of Commerce of the United States made inquiry of the Shipping Board to ascertain if an American vessel was available for this trip prior to deciding on another vessel, and none was forthcoming.

Fifth, The instruction that a British ship was selected because British ships are "wet" and American ships are "dry" is absolutely false, for prior to October, 1922, American ships were as "wet" as British ships, and the contract for the Caronia was closed in June, 1922.

These five facts leave the article with nothing upon which to base its unworthy insinuations.

Very sincerely yours,

ELLIOTT H. GOODWIN. Resident Vice President.

[The address submitted by Mr. Jones of New Mexico to follow the speech of Mr. RANSDELL is as follows:]

THE FARMER AND THE TARIFF.

STABLE FOREIGN MARKETS NECESSARY FOR AMERICAN FARM PROSPERITY. (Address of Hon. Cordell Hull at Topeka, Kans., February 22, 1923.)

It is a most pleasing privilege to visit the historic State of Kansas on this interesting occasion. I am deeply thankful for the high honor and courtesy implied by your kind invitation to be present to-day and to participate in the patriotic observance of Washington's Birthday. For more than a century and a quarter, lovers of liberty here and everywhere have delighted to pay highest tribute on every suitable occasion to the life and services of Washington, who was the outstanding advocate and defender of liberty, justice, and equality. During the month of February in every year the names of two patriots and champions of human rights—Washington and Lincoln—are on every American tongue. Their services to their country and to humanity have rendered their names immortal. gathered his political philosophy almost entirely from the Declaration of Independence written by Thomas Jefferson. The people of this generation could pursue no wiser course than to apply the fundamentals for which Washington and Lincoln stood to our present-day conditions. I doubt not that if these two world-renowned patriots were alive to-day they would be among the principal critics of the course of our governmental affairs at Washington during the past two years, and among the principal champions of the great fundamentals of the polifor which the recent Democratic administration stood. There is no more appropriate time than this occasion offers for us to take stock of the present and to plan for the future.

The Harding administration has now consumed one-half of its allotted time, and with these first two years have gone threefourths of its entire opportunities for accomplishment. Past experience teaches that the first two years practically tell the full story of whether a national administration is a success or a failure. Failure during the first half of its existence spells even greater failure during the remainder. If the Harding administration is a success, the administration of John Tyler was a howling success. If the wholesale failure either to perform preelection promises, or to meet the reasonable expectations of the people, or to make the Government function with any sort of efficiency, or to maintain prosperity, constitute success, the Harding administration will stand out in history without a

If it was the better part of wisdom that the affairs of this Nation should drift during the past two years for the complete lack of vision, initiative, leadership, and constructive service at Washington, the Harding administration is entitled to all praise for its exercise of almost supreme wisdom.

the consistent championship of Newberryism, Daughertyism, Nat Goldsteinism, if the character-assassinating midnight raid on the innocent officials of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and the private exploitation of the Tea Pot Dome exhibit a suitable standard of public morals and decency, the Harding administration has earned the lasting admiration and thanks of the country for its superb moral examples. If the espousal of a wholly unsound position on every great economic question, both domestic and international, constitutes statesthe Harding administration has risen to greater heights of statesmanship than any of its predecessors.

The demoralized condition of the present Republican administration during the past two years owes its origin to the false, insincere, and partisan attitude assumed toward all vital questions by the Republican national leadership in control during 1919 and 1920. During that period Republican leaders made no effort to formulate any definite, affirmative policies, either foreign or domestic. Their sole policy was one of negation, criticism, denunciation, and misrepresentation of the Democratic national administration, which had put forth a practical, timely, and comprehensive program of reconstruction and readjustment embracing all essential phases of both domestic and foreign affairs. The logical outcome of this blind and bitter attitude of partisanship, selfishness, and greed for power was a radical departure from the true party course suggested by statesmanship and patriotism, resulting in irreconcilable elements in the Republican Party, which have made it impotent as an agency of government during the past two

In order temporarily to discredit and break down the Democratic administration, the Republican Congress felt constrained by every sort of opposition and impediment to deadlock the Government during 1919 and 1920, thereby defeating or indefinitely delaying most of the great Democratic program of postwar readjustment and rehabilitation, nationally and internationally. During this tragic period Republican national leaders boasted that only they had the "best minds" and the supermen who could conduct the Government with capacity, efficiency, dispatch, and credit.

At this stage and since there were only two policies that the United States could pursue in relation to domestic and world affairs-" isolation " or "international cooperation." and are separate, distinct, and irreconcilable. The Democratic administration, rejecting isolation as shortsighted, disastrous, and even absurd, boldly and resolutely proclaimed the principle of international cooperation to the extent of America's responsibilities and enlightened self-interest.

Republican leaders during 1919 and 1920 pursued the one plan of defeating even the fundamentals of the Democratic proposals and of confusing and beclouding the whole situation, thereby hopelessly mystifying the American voters. They talked in many directions. They offered cryptic solutions, leading everywhere and nowhere. These Republican leaders, after November election of 1920, awakened to the fact that they had jockeyed their party into a definite position of opposition to the entire principle of international cooperation and of support of the absurd policy of isolation. This calamitous consequence meant that the Harding administration would have nothing to do with world problems of reconstruction and readjustment to the extent of any sane or practical international cooperation-economic, social, moral, or political. This, in brief, is the underlying cause of the humiliating failure to meet every big opportunity which the Harding administration presents today. President Harding glibly announced in 1920 that "government is a very simple thing after all," and his political assoclates joyously indulged in every shade of jazz politics during this period. The inevitable result has been that during the past two years the Harding administration has been wholly unable to extricate itself from the policy of drifting, facing both ways—or rather every way—muddling, lack of purpose, and in-

The Republican Party in control of the Government has degenerated into various discordant groups and irreconcilable elements, with every sort of divergent views and cross purposes, with the natural result that innumerable blocs, such as the "farm bloc," the "labor bloc," the "soldier bloc," and the "business bloc" have been forced into existence in bitter protest against the incapacity and inability of the Harding administration to function. This is in striking contrast with the situation presented by the Democratic Party and its administration during its first two years beginning with 1913. national, unified, cohesive party in charge of the Government in the prices of certain farm products during past months, but proceeded speedily and without the asking to enact a long list the prices of commodities the farmer must buy have also gone of wonderfully constructive legislation in the interest of the up in almost the same proportion, with the result that the farmer, the laborer, the business man, and the American people

That band of Republican political conspirators who undermined and broke down the only program that has yet been offered for the satisfactory dealing with our domestic and international affairs has much to answer for. They held the Nation and the world by the throat in 1919-20. This was the most disgraceful period of partisanship in our history. direct result of their assault on the program and policies of the recent Democratic administration, of their failure to offer any substitute policies, and of their championship of the abominable doctrine of aloofness, has involved greater losses upon the people of America than America's total cost of the World War. They decreed, in effect, that America should turn away from Europe, although Europe is our biggest debtor and our best customer; that America should embrace the doctrine of isolation-economic, moral, social, and political-although we send our commodities to every country in the world, and receive commodities from every country in the world; that America is not a part of the world, although every banker, business man, and economist agree that domestic prosperity and international prosperity go hand in hand. Even many Republican national leaders, who for four years have talked, gestured, and done nothing, now admit that our domestic welfare is bound up with that of Europe and the world. Secretary Hughes, in a speech on December 29, said:
"The economic conditions in Europe give us the greatest concern. It is idle to say that we are not interested in these problems, for we are deeply interested from an economic standpoint, as our credits and markets are involved. We can not dispose of these problems by calling them European, for they are world problems and we can not escape the injurious consequences of a failure to settle them."

Secretary Hoover, in a speech made July 13, 1921, said: "We are mightily concerned in the recuperation of the entire world. The hard times that knock at every cottage door to-day come from Europe. No tariff, no embargoes, no navies, no armies, can ever defend us from these invasions. The recovery of our foreign trade can march only in company with the wel-fare and prosperity of our customers."

It has, notwithstanding, been a matter of supreme indifference to arrogant Republican national leaders that the farmers and other producers of substantial surpluses in this country are wholly dependent upon sound reciprocal foreign markets for their chief prosperity at home, and that the American farmers to-day are the principal victims of European chaos. At no time during the past two years has the Harding administration recognized the economic fact that the American farmers are more vitally interested in the economic stability of Europe than all other classes combined.

What is the condition of the American farmer, his place in the general economic situation, and what are the remedies for the staggering losses he has recently suffered through the dis-ruption of his foreign-trade markets? The farmer should at all times have suitable and adequate long and short term credits and cheaper transportation. Cooperation in transportation, distribution, and marketing, is a most important factor in making farming a success. The one big thing which the farmer needs, however, and has needed during the past two years and more is suitable foreign-market conditions. The vast surpluses of the American farmers have been going to waste during much of the past two years, while the 300,000,000 people in Europe were either hungry or actually starving for want of our surplus foodstuffs.

Had America extended even moral and economic cooperation to our European customers so as to stabilize the credit, exchange, and general economic conditions, our farmers would have had a steady flow of all their surplus products to markets abroad at top prices, with the result that the need for credits at home would not have become at all acute. Credits alone will not bring prosperity to the farmer. The restoration of his foreign-market facilities is the key to American farm pros-This outstanding fact should by this time be burned deeply in the memory of every American farmer in the light of his sad experience during the past two years.

Lower costs for the necessities of life is a second great need of the American farmer. If under such artificial stimulants as the Fordney-McCumber high tariff the prices of what the farmer must buy are increased to a much higher level than the prices of farm products, as is the situation to-day, the farmer's condition becomes desperate. There have been some increases farmer has experienced but slight relief from the awful conditions created by the slump in farm prices in 1921. The prices of commodities, for example, advanced 14 per cent during the months prior to October, 1922. These surprising advances were chiefly due to the unspeakable Fordney-McCumber high tariff law, which took effect September 22, 1922

The American farmers comprise about 26 per cent of our total population, own almost one-third of the wealth of the country, and more than 30 per cent of our population derive their living from the soil. The gross value of agricultural production for was $23,783,000,000; for 1920, $18,263,000,000; for 1921, $12,366,000,000; for 1922, less than $15,000,000,000. ican farmers exported $4,107,000,000 worth of agricultural products during 1919, $3,466,000,000 during 1920, $2,119,000.000 during 1921, and a much less amount during 1922. It is thus seen that from 12 to 20 per cent of our agricultural products must find suitable foreign markets.

The big fact in this connection is that the foreign prices for this surplus constitute the chief factor in fixing the domestic prices of the farmer's products. This economic law applies to every industry in America which produces a substantial surplus above domestic consumption. The price of wheat in Chicago and Minneapolis, for example, has for generations been gov-erned by the world price in Liverpool. The domestic price of cotton is controlled by the world price in London. The price of American wool for 50 years has, with few exceptions, hovered closely around the world prices in the London markets, notwithstanding an absurdly high tariff rate at home.

The farmers of America, for further illustration, received good prices for wheat, corn. meats, and other farm products at home during 1919 and 1920 because similar high prices were being received in Europe for all their surplus. When the European market went to pieces late in 1920 and in 1921 through failure of America to cooperate in maintaining stable exchange, credit, and trade conditions, a great price slump immediately occurred in farm products at home. Here was demonstrated the direct connection between stable foreign markets and American farm prosperity.

Republican politicians sometimes attempt to minimize the value and importance of our agricultural exports by pointing to the much larger quantity the farmers sell at home. For example, they omit the vital fact that 20 per cent to 25 per cent of our wheat must be exported, 8 per cent to 15 per cent of our meat products, 60 per cent of our cotton. It is clear that with no stable foreign markets for these classes of surplus these three great industries would collapse in America on account of congestion, stagnation, and slump in domestic prices. The destruction of these three industries would work havoc not only to other branches of agriculture but to the entire industrial situation in America. Another grossly misleading suggestion which Secretary Hoover publishes from time to time is that the quantity of agricultural exports during the past two years has in some instances been greater than that of 1919 and 1920, and that therefore the farmer should be immensely pleased. fact that the farmer has been receiving panic prices for this larger quantity of exports during 1921 and 1922 is carefully overlooked, although the farmer is interested in the prices received rather than the quantities sold.

Our farmers could ship their entire annual production to Europe and other countries and dispose of it by gift, or at a nominal price, and, according to the philosophy of Secretary Hoover, they should be immensely gratified with the large vol-ume of their foreign trade. According to Hoover, the American farmer was better off engaged in the work of raising and exporting wheat at $1.30 a bushel in 1921 and 1922 than raising and exporting wheat at $2.60 to $2.80 a bushel in 1919 and 1920; or that it was better that he should receive two-thirds as much for 20,000,000 tons in 1921 as he received for 16,000,000 tons sold abroad in 1920.

All these facts confirm the economic truth recently proclaimed by an able Republican, "that American business can not be permanently prosperous, American labor can not be permanently employed at good wages, and the American farmer can not hope to get adequate prices for his products until there is economic stability and recuperation in Europe. The great problem in Europe since the war was to secure our surplus foodstuffs and raw materials in order promptly to go to work to the end that she might produce and thereby maintain her credit situation, strengthen her Government finances, balance her budgets, and in other essential ways progress toward normal conditions. Failing to secure these necessities at the critical stages on account of the Republican doctrine, practice, and preachment of isolation and aloofness, Europe slipped back in the opposite direction and gradually lost her chief purchasing power. Republican leaders, to the extent that they are now suggesting any international proposals for the restoration of sound and permanent conditions of prosperity in America, suggest in principle the same methods and remedies proposed by the Democratic administration in 1919 and 1920 before our farmers, laborers, and business men had suffered the awful panic losses of 1921 and 1922 and before Europe had approached economic ruin. Hon. Nicholas Murray Butler, extreme Republican partisan that he is, was recently forced to admit, almost in so many words, that if the fundamentals of the foreign policies of the Democratic administration had been carried out. it is highly probable that the conditions of peace, economic and other affairs, would have been much improved by this time.

The American farmers, who were the first and chief victims of Republican isolation and Harding normalcy, fell for the claptrap and vagaries preached to them by Republican leaders during 1919 and 1920. The manner in which politicians, scheming alone for power, thus duped this (reat body of patriotic, wellmeaning American farmers can not be characterized as an ordi-

The value of all farm property increased from $40,991,000,000 in 1910 to $77,924,000,000 in 1920. Prior to 1913, when the Democratic administration began, the farmers of America had an annual savings of nearly $1,200,000,000. These annual savings were increased until they became $5,000,000,000 in 1917 and $7,000,000,000 in 1918. From 1913 to 1920, inclusive, the annual savings of the farmers must have averaged more than $3,500,000,000 each year, or an aggregate of $27,000,000,000 as compared with an aggregate pre-war level for the same period of $8,800,000,000. The Republican industrial panic not only swept away most of these increased savings but operated to reduce the values of farm property some 25 per cent. In the face of this unheard-of economic disaster to the farmer then taking place, President Harding's administration assumed control of the Government in March, 1921, without a single suggestion on its program, except a tariff, for the relief of the farmers against imminent industrial ruin. No steps were taken until the Demo-crats in Congress, aided by a few western Republicans, fur-nished the votes which forced the passage of legislation during the latter part of the year for the revival of the Federal Finance Corporation, with the result that it did not resume operations until October, 1921, after the farmers' economic situation had been virtually destroyed. At this stage of incalculable losses the farmers were suffering, President Harding, Secretary Weeks, and other Republican leaders in control, took pains to denounce so-called farm blocs at every opportunity. The farmer must suffer in silence under stand-pat Republican rule. It mattered not that in December, 1921, corn sold 28 per cent below the pre-war level; hogs, 22 per cent; beef cattle, 11 per cent; while household goods sold at 118 per cent above the pre-war level; building materials, 103 per cent, and clothes, 85 per cent above. And there has since been no substantial improvement in this relative disparity of price levels, because, as I have already indicated, the prices of what the farmer must buy have increased almost in proportion to such increases of certain farm products as have occurred during past months.

The fact is most significant that the Harding administration has been content to invoke three important Democratic agencies for farm relief, namely, the Federal reserve system, the farm-loan system, and the War Finance Corporation, and the two latter after the chief losses had been suffered. They have offered nothing new except some kind of additional credit legislation which they threaten to enact during this month. latter proposal excludes any plan or purpose to restore foreign market conditions or to secure cheaper freight rates for the farmers. With the exception of a tariff nostrum, this is the sum total of the shameless record toward the farmer made by the national Republican leadership, whose party has been in overwhelming control of Congress for four years, and of all branches of the Government for two years.

Republican leaders not only fooled and almost destroyed the American farmer in the manner already pointed out, but they unsuccessfully endeavored to fool him with an absurd tariff remedy during 1921 and 1922, as they had successfully done for 40 years prior thereto. While millions of farmers were drifting into bankruptcy or toward industrial ruin in the spring of 1921. the Republican Congress and administration prescribed a dose of high tariff protection as a sure and immediate cure. This they could not avoid doing for the reason that they had preached this quack remedy to the farmer for two generations. A so-called farmers' emergency protective tariff law was enacted in May, 1921, carrying virtually prohibitive rates on the chief farm products. The high rates of 35 cents a bushel on wheat, farm products. 15 cents a bushel on corn, 25 cents a bushel on potatoes, 25 per cent on meat products, and 30 per cent on cattle, were imposed upon the Republican theory and assurance that they would increase prices in corresponding amounts and immediately restore permanent farm prosperity.

Under the operation of these new tariff rates no sophistry or claptrap was ever more completely exploded than the old Republican fraud that the tariff would bring the farmer prosperity. The value of farm products fell off 334 per cent in 1921 despite this so-called emergency tariff. Wheat was selling at $1.53 a bushel when this tariff law was enacted in May, 1921, but it went down each month following until it reached virtually $1 in December. For many months after the passage of this law wheat was higher in Canada than in Minnesota.

The American farmer discovered that tariffs had no remote effect on prices of wheat, corn, cattle, hogs, and so forth; that our large surplus of each is marketed abroad, if at all; and that the prices received there fix prices at home. Farmers discovered that our 200,000,000 bushels of wheat exports for 1922. for instance, met Canada's 340,000,000 bushels of wheat exports in the world market at Liverpool, where ours competed with that of Canada, and where the prices received operated as a chief factor in fixing domestic prices both in the United States and in Canada. The Federal Trade Commission made an exhaustive investigation of wheat prices for 1920 and in its report said:

"To say that the price of American wheat is normally fixed by the export demand is substantially true, in general, and has been especially true this season."

Corn was selling at 58 cents a bushel in May, 1921, but constantly declined until it reached 30 to 46 cents six months later. Instead of the prices of agricultural products rising by the full amount of the tariff, or any amount, they fell almost double the amount. Potatoes till this day are worth almost nothing. The same low level of prices on all farm products thus highly protected " continued for an indefinite time. This "farmers' tariff was enacted upon the ridiculous theory of excluding imports of farm products, although the world had and has none to send here but was and is crying for every ounce of our surplus.

The complaint among the farmers at the utter failure of the Republican tariffs soon became so loud that President Harding. in his message to Congress on December 7, 1921, was obliged to confess that the Republican tariff humbug, so long practiced successfully upon the farmers, had been completely exposed. In this message he said, "Something more than tariff protection is required by American agriculture." In vain the Democrats proclaimed, during this period of unparalleled distress to the farmers, that tariffs were not the remedy but that the restoration and maintenance of sound foreign-market conditions, lower freight rates, and adequate credits were the measures of relief which the farmers' condition imperatively demanded. Harding administration ignored these pleas until after the great losses befell the farmers, and even since they only suggest belated credits as a remedy.

The American farmer can render himself a more lasting service and do more to promote his permanent prosperity than any other agency can effect, if he will but ignore the false Republican propaganda and make an impartial investigation of the effect of protective tariffs on American agriculture. Recent tests of such tariffs should completely satisfy the farmer, but the sooner the farmer decides that he has been the victim of Republican protective tariffs for two generations, and in no sense the beneficiary, the sooner will he return to stable conditions of prosperity. A protective tariff, speaking generally, is immoral and dishonest, because its sole purpose is to increase prices artificially, in certain instances, thereby enabling one citizen to levy unjust tribute from another. There is some dishonest plausibility for the practice of this unjust and unequal policy by a provincial country, but a high protective tariff system in America at this time flies in the face of every sound economic law. It will be the chief domestic issue in 1924.

It is economic suicide for any important commercial country, producing vast surpluses which must be exported and sold in the markets of the world, to maintain a system of high protec-tive tariff taxation. The operation of such system creates an artificially high level of costs of production, with the result that surpluses thus produced can not be shipped and sold in world markets in competition with similar products manufactured in countries not afflicted with such tariffs and such artificially high production costs.

The tariff record of the Republican Party, under the control of its reactionary leadership, reeks with bad faith, duplicity, corruption, and misrepresentation. Their position has been based on wholly unsound economic law, and upon the practice of selfish extortion by legal sanction. The high tariff system was originally invoked upon the plea of protection of infant industries. At a later stage, when the full-grown industries rendered this excuse absurd, the theory was modified so as to pretend to seek the protection of American labor. In 1908, after American labor and the public generally had unanimously decided that the manufacturer was retaining for himself all or most all the tariff benefits, Republican reactionary leaders adopted a new formula which declared for a tariff measured by the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, plus a reasonable profit to the manufacturers. This bald demand for excessive tariff profits became ridiculous during the four years that followed and brought forth from Colonel Roosevelt bitter denunciation and a demand that labor's share of tariff benefits should thereafter be inserted in the pay en-

The present-day Republican reactionary leadership does not offer any definite tariff rule or formula, except some vague reference to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. Business, industrial, and general economic conditions during and since the war have rendered it utterly impossible to ascertain either domestic or foreign production costs. The result under the Harding administration has been that high-tariff rates have been written without rhyme or reason, and have only been limited by the greed of the manufacturers who contributed to the Republican campaign fund in 1920.

The American farmer has suffered unmeasured injury from typical Republican high-tariff systems of the past for the reason that it was and is impossible for him to derive any tariff benefits from the production and sale of such staple products as wheat, corn, oats, hay, cattle, and hogs. Republican politicians, however, have pursued the policy of giving the farmer high rates on these products, and in turn demanding that the farmer stand for rates far higher on most all finished manufactured products, which rates, in most instances, have the effect of greatly raising the prices which the farmer, in common with all other consumers, must pay. The farmer, for example, has already learned from recent experience that high tariffs have had no effect on the staple products just named. cite an instance where it does have a serious effect on prices to the injury of the farmers and all other American consumers. The Fordney-McCumber tariff law increased the tariff on sugar 76 per cent over the Underwood law. Under the operation of existing sugar rates the American people each year pay $98,500,000 into the Federal Treasury, and at the same time pay $98,500,000 into the pockets of the beet and cane sugar The price of sugar was promptly raised to a manufacturers. figure corresponding precisely with the increase of the tariff.

A small group of large woolgrowers in the Rocky Mountain States were given a tariff of 31 cents a pound on scoured wool, which carries with it a potential tariff advantage of $34,-200,000, and assures to the Treasury $33,000,000 of tariff taxes. These, however, are the least items in the transaction. producers and manufacturers of woolen cloth and like products caused high compensatory tariff rates to be inserted in the woolen schedule for their benefit, under the operation of which the American public is compelled to pay them $130,000,000 in tariff profits over and above a reasonable profit. In other words, the American people are taxed at least $200,000,000 under the operation of the woolen schedule of the Fordney-McCumber law, only $33,000,000 of which reaches the Treasury.

Similar high tariff rates and resulting tariff extortion applying to hats, clothing, cutlery, iron and steel products, women's wear, gloves, corsets, and most all other necessities of life, have been heaped upon the backs of the American people under the present outrageous system of Republican high-tariff taxation. The very minimum of cost of the Fordney-McCumber tariff to the American people in the way of excessive prices is $3,500,000,000. Almost every month the Aluminum Trust, the Woolen Trust, the drug and chemical concerns, and most all other industries that were favored by this tariff outrage are marking up prices, and will continue to do so for some time to come.

The conservative American Farm Bureau Federation is reported in the press to have carefully figured out the net gain to farmers from all agricultural duties, which they place at $25,900,000. The farmers and those who derive their living from the soil, on the other hand, according to most conservative calculations, will pay to the manufacturer of all the articles they must buy to wear or use near $900,000,000 in excessive tariff prices. These tariff benefits accruing to the manufactariff prices. These tariff benefits accruing to the manufac-turer in excess of a reasonable profit include such rates as 60 per cent on undecorated china, 60 per cent on window curtains, 90 per cent on laces, from 75 to 400 per cent on pocketknives and other cutlery, 75 per cent on cotton gloves, 70 per cent on toys for the children, from 30 to 50 per cent on hosiery, 40 per cent on umbrellas, and 45 per cent on cotton underwear.

It is thus seen that in order to get $450,000,000 of tariff taxes into the Treasury each year the American consumers must pay not less than $3,500,000,000 in excessive prices to the domestic manufacturer. The present tariff system on dutiable merchandise averages near 40 per cent. The annual output of our manufacturers should now approach $45,000,000,000. If they should only increase prices on an average of 6 per cent under the tariff, they would reap a bounty of $2,700,000,000, to say nothing of the effects of corresponding increase of prices by retailers. The farmers must now realize that since virtually no corn, wheat, cattle, hogs, or meats are brought to this country under any conditions a tariff of 1,000 per cent on each would not increase his prices.

No nation is better equipped in natural resources, production, and transportation facilities to compete with all the world than America is to-day. A competitive tariff for revenue carrying such rates as would insure reasonable competition, prevent domestic monopoly, and at the same time not destroy or seriously injure any industry which it may be economically profitable to conduct, offers the only sound policy of customs taxation. Our benighted stand-pat Republican leaders can not realize that a wonderful change in our financial, commercial, and industrial affairs has taken place during recent years; that we are a great creditor Nation, with a foreign debt of $15,000,000,000; that we possess nearly one-half of the world's gold supply, a wonderful merchant marine, a productive output of 30 to 40 per cent above the capacity of the country to consume; the most improved machinery, the highest skilled labor, and by far the largest output per man of any other country. Reactionary Republican leaders still cling to the old high tariff, which is based upon the modern absurdity that commerce is not chiefly exchange of commodities; that we will sell but not buy; that our debtors can pay us in gold which we and not they possess; that our merchant marine should only carry freight in one direction-everything going out and nothing coming in-and that our increased productive capacity of more than 30 per cent, involving an annual income of $15,000,000,000, should be cut down to equal our home consumption, thereby throwing a vast amount of capital, farm lands, and labor out of employment. Under the blighting threat of this archaic policy our foreign trade fell from $13,200,000,000 in 1920 to nearly $7,000,-000,000 in 1921, and to $6,000,000,000 in 1922. A high tariff here is a challenge to every law of international trade. It hopelessly obstructs the flow of commerce both ways. It prevents Europe, for example, from paying us for our surplus foodstuffs, raw materials, and manufactures with any kind of barter in the known absence of both cash and credit. high tariff says: "If we can not sell our surplus abroad for cash, we shall not exchange goods we do not need for goods we do need."

The most casual observer must conclude, in the light of the economic developments of the past few years, that America can not sell unless she is willing to buy, and that our future prosperity lies beyond the seas. The farmer must now see that his products sell both at home and abroad at world prices, which he does not fix, plus the cost of marketing, while manufactured products sell in America at prices the manufacturer himself arbitrarily fixes, which is added to both the cost of marketing and the high-tariff benefits.

The Harding administration occupies a wholly unsound position on every economic question, both domestic and international. The present Republican policies of inordinately high-tariff protection and of commercial isolation will forever prevent the recovery of the purchasing power of Europe, will suppress our foreign trade, and will operate as a most serious handicap to satisfactory business conditions at home.

The American people are now realizing that the so-called accomplishments of the Harding administration are but commonplace when compared with its many really big duties and opportunities for service and its bigger failures. They can only turn to the great historic Democratic Party for relief—a party which when in power always stood for definite policies, both foreign and domestic; a party which always proclaimed a clear-cut program, and, with vision, constructive ability, and aggressive leadership, prosecuted it to a conclusion.

Mr. CAPPER and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Oddie in the chair). The Senator from Kansas. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CAPPER. I just want a very few minutes.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has been recognized. I thought there was an understanding that I was to be recognized at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana; but go ahead.

Mr. CAPPER. I just want a very few minutes, but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. No; go ahead.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the ship-subsidy propagandists have declared that the farmers are for a subsidy.

I have received resolutions and memorials from more than 300 farm organizations and letters from more than 500 individual farmers protesting against the passage of the shipping bill. Not one farmer has written to me in favor of this measure, and, so far as I am able to learn, no farm organization has gone on record for this legislation.

The subsidy propagandists have declared that the farmers are for a subsidy. The truth is that the Farmers' Union, the National Grange, the Farm Bureau, the Society of Equity, and every other big farm organization in the country is on record against it. Some time ago the Iowa Farm Bureau Federation and the Iowa Farmers' Union took a poll of their membership on the question. The total number of farmers for the measure was 491; the total number against it was 14,000. That shows how strong the farmers are for a ship subsidy. They have fought this un-American policy every time it has shown its head.

The subsidy propagandists are all things to all men. In the West they tell the farmer that a bonus for shipowners will assure him a foreign market. In the East they tell the manufacturer that a subsidized American merchant marine would enable him to sell a 40 per cent surplus of manufactured goods in South and Central America, and that these ships returning would bring back cheap wheat and meat from Argentina and Brazil, sugar from Haiti and San Domingo, besides coffee, cocoa, and raw materials like rubber and tropical woods, whereby these manufacturers would have cheap raw materials and food for their big industrial population on the eastern seaboard, and so be enabled to compete more successfully with Germany and Britain.

With this country's advantages in natural resources and its advantages in machinery and in more efficient, more industrious, and more sober labor, we should be able to compete with the rest of the world without an artificial stimulant like a ship subsidy; but if we are going to use our own raw materials and these natural resources, we have got to have the farmer, and we can not put him out of business and keep him, too.

The subsidy propagandists also hold out the lure of cheaper shipping rates to farmers and manufacturers, although one of the reasons for asking a bonus for shipowners from the public is because lower rates are made by foreign ships than our American shipowners are willing to meet. Advocates of the subsidy allege discrimination by these foreign carriers against American products. The American farmer's foreign market is mainly in the manufacturing countries of Europe, which are not competitors of the American farmer but are eager for his products. If there is discrimination shown against American products in favor of foreign exports, it would logically be almed at goods of American manufacture with which foreign countries compete in trade. It is a question whether any serious discrimination is practiced. It has not cut much of a figure in the subsidy debate.

But suppose we should embark on this subsidy proposition. Where would it end? If the ocean shipping business is unprofitable just now, so is wheat and potato growing and other kinds of farming. Far sounder reasons could be advanced for subsidizing the farming industry. Samuel Rea, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, in a letter to the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce, makes the point that he sees no reason why the Government should not subsidize the railroads, although declaring himself personally a disbeliever in the theory of subsidies.

Reference often is made to the fact that England supports a ship subsidy. The amount, all told, comes to $3,000,000 a year and is chiefly for mail service. The United States Postal Department pays our shipowners more than that for mail contracts.

However, suppose this country should subsidize its shipping: What is to hinder England, Japan, and others from soon being at our heels with other subsidizing measures. In a contest of this kind one subsidy would be quite likely to lead to another. Possibly our great ship companies hope for something like this to happen. One of the clinching arguments of the ship subsidists is: "If we do not pass the subsidy bill we can not self these war built ships." Suppose we pass the subsidy bill and sell these ships, what will we get for them? Two hundred million dollars. The subsidy would cost us $200,000,000 in three years or less, and we would only have begun paying it. What is there to that argument? We might better sink the ships.

During hearings on the bill Chairman Lasker of the Shipping Board conceded that the direct charges on the Treasury would amount to $52,125,000 a year. This is an underestimate if we consider the probable sum that the bill's exemption from income taxes allows shipowners and the innumerable indirect aids provided. The subsidy, if enacted, may easily cost the American taxpayer $75,000,000 a year, or $750,000,000 in 10 As a consumer of funds and revenue it has unlimited possibilities. On its face, it provides for paying a subsidy almost double the total of mail pay, construction bounties, subsidies, and subventions paid to shipowners by all other nations combined. Their combined total is only something like $46,000,-000 a year.

Mr. President, in dealing with the ship subsidy bill as legislators it becomes us to consider the facts deliberately from the viewpoint of the general public we are here to serve. its front of fair promises the ship subsidy bill is, in my judgment, a most astounding piece of legislative legerdemain and iniquity. In effect it proposes to tie the hands of this and other administrations, of Congress, and of the public, and to deliver all three bound and helpless to the shipping interests, to be dealt with about as these gentlemen see fit. I am utterly opposed to the payment by the Government of a subsidy to any private interest. It is a dangerous principle.

A ship subsidy would be of decided advantage to the speculators, who are willing to take a chance when the Government puts up the money; but of what advantage could it be to the public, which sank $3,000,000,000 in building the emergency fleet during the war, and which since has been putting up $50,000,000 a year to operate a small part of that fleet at a loss, while the rest of the fleet lay rotting in idleness?

The losses a ship subsidy in all probability would bring on this country can not be calculated; but I can not see how the subsidy can do anything more than to pile up immense costs against the Government, and start an international subsidy war with circles of international subsidies and a very harmful series of raids or attempted raids on the Treasury by industries here at home.

Why throw good money after bad? Have we not lost more than $3,000,000,000 of public money in a merchant marine that can not operate? I fully appreciate, Mr. President, the need of developing our merchant marine; but I believe a better way can and will be found than is proposed in the pending measure. Therefore, I shall oppose it.

Mr. POMERENE obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield, if it does not take me off the floor. Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator. I should like the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones].

I ask unanimous consent that before the vote on the pending motion to recommit is taken a vote shall be taken upon the substitute bill offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Mc-KELLARI. I understand that this substitute bill is identical with the pending ship subsidy bill reported by the committee except that it strikes out the provisions of the bill which provide for a subsidy, and substitutes instead preferential tariff rates in favor of American goods carried in American ships. This was President Madison's policy that built up our merchant marine before the war. I ask unanimous consent that such a vote be taken before the vote on the pending motion, which is to recommit the bill to the committee. We can do much to assist our merchant marine by preferential tariff duties at this time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I could not consent to that under the circumstances. We have had no opportunity to vote on any of the amendments to this bill heretofore, and we have come now to a motion to recommit, and are about ready to close the matter, and I think we had better close it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusets. I simply wanted to say that the challenge has been made here that nothing constructive has been offered. Here is a constructive measure proposing a means and method of helping the American merchant marine, and I wanted to put myself on record as in favor of preferential tariff At least we should consider the advisability of preferential tariff rates to assist in developing our merchant marine regardless of our views on the principles of a subsidy.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, if the Senator will permit me just a second, I would have been glad if we could have reached a point where we could consider all these pro-posals made, including the proposal made by the Senator from Tennessee, but apparently we have not been able to reach that point.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from Ohio will permit me, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the other day, in a colloquy between the Senator from Washington and myself, he expressed very great approval at some such provision as that contained in this substitute, providing for a

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am opposed at the pres ent time to the recommitment of the ship subsidy bill. On perhaps two occasions recently I have voted against displacing the bill. My reason for the votes I have cast, and the one I will cast on the pending motion, is, first, that this legislation is of such paramount importance that I think we should not permit anything else to take its place; secondly, because I am opposed to a filibuster.

I came to the Senate 12 years ago ardently opposed to the filibustering program which had been adopted theretofore to defeat legislation. I was then told that I would change my views in that behalf before I had been long in the Senate. Since I have been here I have witnessed a number of filibusters. I saw the Republicans in 1915 defeat the merchant marine bill which was championed by a Democratic President and Democratic Members of the Senate.

I am now withessing a filibuster by some Democrats and some Republicans to defeat the pending ship subsidy bill, which likewise has for its purpose the establishing of a merchant marine. In 1916 I favored the then pending shipping bill and was opposed to the filibuster. Now, I am opposed to the pending bill in its present form, but I am likewise opposed to the fillbuster which has been engaged in for the purpose of preventing a vote upon the bill, if not for the purpose of preventing its legitimate consideration.

Minorities in a legislative body have their rights and so have majorities, and one of the rights and responsibilities of a majority is to legislate. Full and fair opportunity to be heard should be given to the minority under any and all circumstances. but in my humble judgment no minority at any time, under any circumstances, has the right in a test of physical endurance in the expiring days of a Congress to prevent legislation simply because they are opposed to it.

It would be just as consistent for a minority in a popular election to seek to prevent the declared choice of a majority from functioning as it is for the elected minority in a legislative body to prevent the majority from functioning. This is my view frankly and dispassionately expressed; and without committing myself irrevocably, because I can not anticipate the developments of the next few days, my firm conviction is that this subject of a merchant marine should be kept before the Senate and not be displaced, so that it can be thoroughly discussed with the hope that Senators may come to a vote and vote their real convictions. And even if the discussions should continue so long that there will not be time enough to get a final vote upon the merits of the bill, I am certain it will be illuminating and lead to a right solution of the problem, if not at this session at the next session of the Congress

Since the ship subsidy bill has been before the Senate I have heard various arguments made for and against a filibuster. Some Senators who have heretofore favored it are against this one. Others who favor the present filibuster have been against others of like character. Fine discriminations have been drawn between proper and improper filibusters, but reduced to their final analysis, what the distinguished Senators who use them seem to mean is this: They are for the filibuster when they are opposed to legislation which is at the time before the Senate, and they are opposed to the fillbuster when they favor legislation pending before the Senate. A filibuster is either right or it is wrong, and it ought to be controlled under any and all circumstances to the end that legislative bodies can function.

Recognizing the right of every Senator to his own views, trust they will respect my right to mine. In my judgment, there is no more important subject that can engross the attention of Congress than the consideration of our merchant marine and its proper settlement. It is not going to add anything to the enlightenment of the American people to now postpone or defer the discussion of this subject.

Personally I am opposed to ship subsidy. I do not believe it can be made a success. I think it will prove, if adopted, a snare and a delusion.

Mr. KING. Would it interrupt the Senator to make a suggestion or ask a question relative to the filibuster part of the address to which he has just referred?

Mr. POMERENE. No.

Mr. KING. I suggest to the Senator, apropos of his discussion of the filibuster, if he does not differentiate between the situation which exists to-day, where the present Congress was not elected upon the ship-subsidy issue, and the situation presented by the new Congress which will come into being on the 4th of March, which was elected upon that issue; at least, that constituted one of the controversial questions in the campaign? If the President of the United States should call Congress in extraordinary session on the 5th day of March for the consideration of this subject, as I think he should-

I think I can say to the Senator that on this side of the Chamber there would be but limited debate, and within three weeks a ship subsidy bill could be finally brought to a vote in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah must answer that question to suit himself. I answer it to suit myself. I have certain responsibilities that are with me, and will remain with me for a few days. The ship subsidy was not an issue in the State of Ohio. It was referred to occasionally, but it was not discussed generally.

TIME TO ACT IS NOW.

Some plan ought to be adopted and its consideration ought not be deferred. Every day's delay adds to the loss to the Government. The President has told us that the annual loss under Government operation is $50,000,000, not taking into consideration the depreciation, insurance, or interest on invested capital. And if we were to keep them in mind the total loss to the Government, due to the present lack of policy, will require us to add one hundred millions to the fifty millions of loss the President referred to in his address to Congress, to say nothing of the wooden and concrete ships built during the period of the Prior to 1856 we had one of the two greatest fleets of merchant ships in all the world. About the year 1856 it began to During the Civil War 100 of our merchantmen were sunk by enemy cruisers, and 600 were sold to companies flying foreign flags, principally the British flag.

In 1789 we began to encourage shipbuilding and ship owning in the United States. At that time we had only 124,000 tons of shipping. We carried only 17 per cent of our imports and 30 per cent of our exports.

In 1795, as a result of this legislation, our tonnage had increased to 529,500 tons, and then we carried 92 per cent of our imports and 88 per cent of our exports. By the year 1800 our tonnage had increased to 667,000 tons. We then carried 91 per cent of our imports and 87 per cent of our exports. In 1810 our tonnage had increased to 1,000,000, and we carried 93 per cent of our imports and 90 per cent of our exports.

In the year 1913 our tonnage was only 938,000, being about 100,000 tons less than we had in 1810, though our population had increased from 7,239,881 in 1810 to more than 91,972,266 in 1913, and in that year instead of carrying 93 per cent of our exports and imports we were carrying only 12 per cent, and we were paying Great Britain $175,000,000 to carry our commerce for us on the high seas.

Capt. W. W. Bates, former United States Commissioner of Navigation, in his American Marine, published in 1892, clares that in the 30 years preceding we had paid $4,500,000,000 to foreign ships for ocean transportation, or on an average of about $150,000,000 a year. This sum was almost equal to the total cost of the Civil War.

We have 1,442 steel ships with a total tonnage aggregating 7,000,000 gross tons. We are only operating 421 of these vessels. One thousand and twenty-one are tied up. These operations were continued during the past year at a loss of $50,000,-000, but this loss does not include depreciation or interest on investment or insurance.

What shall be done with them?

Shall we permit them to rust out or wear out while foreign bottoms are carrying, according to Mr. Lasker, 71 per cent of our exports and probably an equal proportion of our imports, at a cost to the American producer annually of one hundred and fifty to two hundred millions of dollars which is paid to ship-owners flying foreign flags? Certainly no American who takes pride in his country and its accomplishments can indorse such a policy.

Shall we sell this fleet which cost us, in round numbers, $3,000,000,000 to foreign shipping companies and have it operated under foreign flags and again be placed at the mercy of foreign merchantmen, as we were during the World War, when ocean freight rates were increased to American merchantmen as much as 1,200 per cent? Certainly the most productive Nation in the world can not and will not tolerate a repetition

Shall we continue Government ownership and operation of these ships in the face of the tremendous losses which we have suffered due to Government operation, and in light of the experience which we had with Government operation of the railroads for a period of 26 months, during which time the Government incurred a deficit of $1,800,000,000, which must be paid by the taxpayer? Dreamers and theorists may so desire, but practical men never.

Or, again, shall the Government continue to operate these ships in competition with foreign-owned ships, which are constantly being aided to a greater or less degree by subsidies, subventions, bounties, or other preferential privileges, and in competition with privately owned American ships, and meet the deficit out of the Public Treasury and at the same time bankrupt the privately owned American ships? Certainly that course is not fair either to the taxpayers of the country or to the private owners of American registered ships.

PREFERENTIAL FREIGHT AND TARIFF RATES BETTER THAN SUBSIDY.

What, then, shall be done? Perhaps a year ago in answering certain constituents, some of whom favored and others opposed the subsidizing of the American merchant marine, I said:

I am for an American merchant marine. I never have liked subsidy, and I do not like it now. I want a merchant marine without subsidy if I can have it, but I want a merchant marine.

Interpreting these words, I meant then and I mean now, if there is no feasible way of building up and maintaining a merchant marine except a subsidy I would favor it, but I am not convinced that there is not another and better way in which to build up this merchant marine so that it will not only rival but surpass the merchant marine of even the British Empire. On the contrary, I think it has been clearly proven that a subsidy would not be a success, and particularly the plan presented to us in the pending bill. I am therefore opposed to it.

I take it that the far-flung British Empire has the right to build up and maintain her merchant fleet in any way that may seem wise to her people. This she did for many years, if not for centuries, by preferential freight and tariff rates, subsidies, subventions, and by other policies which suited her purpose. I shall not pause now to discuss them. Now she gives subventions to her fast ships, but none to her slower ships.

In 1815 the Congress of the United States, in the so-called limited marine reciprocity act, and later in 1828 by the so-called free freighting act, agreed to suspend our preferential tariff rates theretofore given to American bottoms provided other nations would grant the same privileges. Great Britain did not see fit to accept this proposition until about the year 1849, at a time when she felt that with her iron merchant ships she could dominate the shipping of the world, and it was then mutually agreed between these nations that preferential rates should be abolished. Shortly thereafter Great Britain inaugurated her subvention policy, which at least was violative of the spirit of the treaty between the two nations.

It is my judgment, after a pretty careful examination of the statute of 1828, that there is now no binding contract between the British Empire and our country, because, while under the statute of 1828 we offered reciprocal ship privileges to other nations when they signified their intention to grant the same to us-Great Britain did consent in 1849 to do so-yet the statute of 1828 provided that such an agreement should not take effect except upon the issuance of a proclamation to that effect by the President of the United States, and no such proclamation was ever issued.

Will subsidy solve the problem? If other nations have adopted it, is that a reason why we should adopt it, or proof that we can build up and maintain our merchant marine if we do adopt it? If we attempt to meet their subsidy by a subsidy, can not they add to theirs?

If funds are paid directly out of the Treasury of the United States into the coffers of the ship companies, will not one of its effects be to destroy their initiative? Does the payment of this bonus to the ship give a guarantee that it will get the cargo to carry? Will it not, therefore, be better to devise some scheme which will give greater assurance of success'

Various Congresses have attempted subsidy before. have never succeeded in having the plan adopted, and the probability is that it will not now be adopted, and if it should be adopted we will not know that it will be a success until we have tried it out. Because it is now unpopular does not necessarily demonstrate that it might not be a success, but even if it should be a success, it seems to me that we ought not to adopt it until all other means shall have failed.

I am not unmindful of the fact that our distinguished President is earnestly advocating this measure, and that it is being pressed with vigor in the Congress of the United States, and very often by men who are at heart opposed to it. The two ablest speeches that have been made in the Senate in favor of ship subsidy were by the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones], the chairman of the Commerce Committee, a Republican, and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSBELL], a member of the same committee, a Democrat.

SENATOR JONES ON SUBSIDY.

The Senator from Washington, in his report on the merchant marine act of 1920, quotes a letter from Admiral Benson (p. 6, No. 573, May 4, 1920) under date of April 19, 1920, to "Senator W. L. Jones, chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce," in which he says in part:

Other nations have by direct subsidy guaranteed the operation of their fleets in world competition. We believe it unnecessary for the United States to adopt a like policy.

On page 9 of this report, the Senator from Washington said, with respect to the abrogation of our treaties:

For many years the United States has been prevented from doing what was clearly to its advantage to do in order to build up the merchant marine by restrictions imposed upon it through commercial treaties. There can be no more opportune time to abrogate these treaties and make new commercial arrangements if they are deemed advisable than now. France has already notified of her desire to abrogate her treaty with us, and we should put ourselves in a position where we can do whatever we deem necessary to promote our commercial and marine welfare.

For these reasons—

The Senator sald in the report-we have made provisions for this by directing the President to give the notice necessary to abrogate such treaties.

From a colloquy between the Senator from Washington and myself last December, when the shipping bill was under discussion, I quote as follows:

From a colloquy between the Senator from Washington and myself last December, when the shipping bill was under discussion, I quote as follows:

Mr. Pomersny. We had a splendid merchant marine up until about the time of the Civil War.

Mr. Jongs of Washington. In a speech I made when the Underwood-Simmons bill was up I took up the shipping history of the country in five-year periods and showed when we reached our apex and when we began to decline, and I convinced myself at any rate that our declining shipping was due to and began largely with our repeal of the discriminating-duty clause. While it did not reach the final conclusion probably until the Civil War, it was going down, at any rate. The conclusion probably until the Civil War, it was going down, at any rate. Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the Senator refer to the act of 1920?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the Senator refer to the act of 1920?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will state what it did. It directed the President to abrogate the treaties which had prevented our adopting a policy of that kind. It did not of itself undertake a policy of that kind. If did not of itself undertake a policy of that kind. If did not of itself undertake a policy of that kind. If did not of itself undertake a policy of that kind. If did not of itself undertake a policy of that were now abrogated, so that there could be some differential in tariff rates on goods carried in American bottoms, it would meet the situation?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am firmly convinced of if.

Mr. POMERENE. Does not the Senator think if negotiations were begun with the other nations of the world that some modification of those treaties could be made so as to permit it?

Mr. JONES. I think so, if we would take a pretty firm attitude; but two administrations, one Democratic and the other Republican, have refused, I might say absolutely refused, to carry out that polley. (Page 855, Cononessional Recount has senator and the that would be made so as to permit it?

Mr. JONES. I don't have been made

SENATOR RANSDELL ON SUBSIDY.

In a colloquy with the distinguished senior Senator from Louisiana I said in part:

But my history informs me that before the Civil War we did have merchant marine, and it was a merchant marine of which we were ye proud.

Mr. Ransbell. The Senator's history also tells him that we had a discriminating duty at that time, and the merchant marine was built up on a discriminating duty. If we could have the discriminating duty now, I would infinitely prefer it to this. I would put this subsidy bill aside in a second if we could enforce the discriminating duty provided

There are no two men in the Senate for whom I entertain a higher regard than for the able and distinguished Senators from Washington [Mr. Jones] and from Louisiana [Mr. Rans-DELL]. Both of them have given great study to this problem. If they spoke to me out of the fullness of their convictions in favor of subsidy, even though I did not accept their judgment,

I could say, "Almost thou persuadest me to believe." But when these great Senators extend their hands and appeal to me to vote for a subsidy which their own judgment does not approve, and when they frankly tell me, as they told the Senate, that they infinitely prefer some plan of discriminating duties or traffic rates, I can not help but say, "The hand of Esau, but the voice of Jacob."

These two advocates of ship subsidy do not stand alone in their vigorous opposition to subsidy, even though they here advocate it and intend to vote for it.

REPUBLICANS FAVOR DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

In these closing hours of the Sixty-seventh Congress I shall not take the time to quote Democratic authority upon the subject, further than to say that the declarations of the party have been uniformly against subsidies, but always in favor of rebuilding our merchant marine. On the other hand, the National Republican Party has never declared itself in favor of subsidies

The Republican national platform of 1896 declared:

We favor restoring the early American policy of discriminating duties for the upbuilding of our merchant marine and the protection of our shipping in foreign trade so that American ships, the product of American labor employed in American shippards, sailing under the Stars and Stripes, and manned, officered, and owned by Americans, may regain the carrying of our foreign commerce.

In his letter of acceptance William McKinley said with reference to this plank:

The declaration of the Republican platform in favor of the upbuilding of our merchant marine has my hearty approval. The policy of discriminating duties in favor of our shipping, which privilege they had in the early years of our history, should be again promptly adopted by Congress and vigorously supported until our prestige and supremacy on the seas is fully attained. We should no longer contribute directly or indirectly to the maintenance of the colossal marines of foreign countries but provide a complete and efficient marine of our own. (Discriminating Duty Policy, p. 22.)

When the Wilson-Gorman tariff bill was pending in the Senate in 1894 Senator Frye offered an amendment on June 21, 1894, providing for a discriminating duty of 10 per cent ad valorem in addition to the duties imposed by law on all merchandise rem in addition to the duties imposed by law on an inerchandise imported in vessels not of the United States, and it further provided that this duty should not apply on goods imported in foreign bottoms after January 1, 1893, and the notice of this provision should be given all nations before the 31st day of December next.

In discussing these amendments Senator Frye said their effect-would be to give notice to all the nations of the world of a discriminating duty of 10 per cent in favor of all goods brought into the country in American vessels, and that notice will abrogate all treaties hitherto made which stand in our way.

In the same speech he further said:

I believe and have always believed that the true method of revival is through discriminating duties; that the fathers were right; but I have always been restrained by these treaties. (Page 12.)

Again he said:

The American merchant marine would have been where England's is to-day if it had not been for the treaties made with those countries and our accepted reciprocal legislation.

Now, Mr. President, in that same debate the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge], the present leader of the majority,

If it would not interrupt the Senator, I should like to ask him in that connection if Great Britain has not pursued by indirection the same method; that is, by the rates on insurance at Lloyd's and by premiums on iron steamships, of discriminating in favor of our tonnage down to the present day?

I have read from the Congressional Record of June 20, 1894. page 6571.

My contention is that while Great Britain and the other nations have observed the letter of the conventions they have violated their spirit.

Senator Stewart, of Nevada, a Republican, said:

These treaties-

Meaning the treaties giving reciprocal rights or privilegeshave been substantially violated. We are under no obligation in consequence of these treaties, because all of the important nations which entered into them have subsidized their carrying trade, which is a violation of the principle, and we ought to take some notice of it, at least.

In February, 1896, Senator Elkins, of West Virginia, the father of the present Senator Elkins from that State, introduced a bill providing for discriminating duties.

In the speech which Senator Elkins made he said:

From these records it appears from 1789 to 1800 the carrying of our imports in American ships increased from 174 per cent to 92 per cent, and our exports from 30 to 88, and from 1800 to 1810 this ratio was substantially maintained, making the average of our foreign commerce carrying in American ships for the period from 1800 to 1810 91½ per cent of our imports and 87 per cent of our exports.

As a result of this and other supplemental legislation of the same kind, in 1810 our share in the carrying trade of the world was about as great as that of England.

I may say that Senator Elkins presented a bill to reenact the same kind of discriminating duties which were originated by the fathers.

Madison, in the First Congress, introduced the bill providing for discriminating duties and tonnage charges. He built up the merchant marine and the Navy so successfully that with it we won the War of 1812; and it was at least a coincidence that James Madison was President of the United States when war was started.

I think a careful study of the national platforms of the Republican Party justifies the statement that it has never declared in favor of a subsidy plan, and that wherever it has declared itself specifically it has been in favor of discriminating duties. REVERSAL OF POLICY.

This policy of discriminating rates continued undiminished until 1815. Then Congress began to reverse its program, and by a statute approved March 4 of that year was begun the "limited This was the first direct attack on dismaritime reciprocity." criminating duties.

In 1828 the "free freighting act" was passed in the interest of foreign shippers. Treaties were entered into in pursuance of the provisions of this act, and they have substantially destroyed every advantage which we had derived from the original legislation of 1789 and the acts supplemental thereto.

In building wooden ships, prior to the perfection of the iron ships, we beat the world. In 1840 Great Britain began to build iron ships, and by the year 1849 felt that her iron ships as then improved would place her merchant marine in a better position than that of any other country.

In 1849 she entered into a convention with the United States, accepted the reciprocity provisions of our law of 1828, and from the time this agreement was made American shipping began to decline and British shipping to advance. Having obtained this reciprocal agreement, the British Empire adopted a policy of ship subsidy, which was perhaps not a direct violation of the treaty obligations growing out of the reciprocity policy, but it had indirectly that effect. They violated the spirit, even if they did observe the letter, of their agreement.

For the information of Senators, I want to remind them that while this convention was entered into, the statute of 1828 provided that this reciprocal agreement should not go into effect until so declared by a proclamation of the President of the United States, which has never, even to this day, been issued.

Senator Jones, the chairman of the Commerce Committee, with great ability and insistence is pressing this subsidy bill for a vote; but I do not forget that this same distinguished Senator—and I say it with all due respect, because I have a very high regard for both his ability and his high purpose was the chairman of the committee in 1920 when the Jones

Merchant Marine Act was passed.

Section 34 of that act declared in substance that in the judgment of Congress, treaties or conventions which restrict the right of the United States to impose discriminatory duties on imports entering the United States in foreign vessels and in vessels of the United States, and which restrict the right of the United States to impose discriminatory tonnage dues on foreign vessels and on vessels of the United States, should be terminated; and the President was authorized and directed, within 90 days, to give notice to the several governments that all parts of existing treaties which imposed such restrictions on the United States should terminate on the expiration of such periods as might be required for the giving of such notice by the provisions thereof.

If this was the view of Congress on June 5, 1920, when the act was passed, why should we reverse our step before take it? This bill, passed by Congress and approved President Wilson, was the decree of the American people, through their representatives, declaring in favor of discriminatory duties and tonnage taxes. True, President Wilson and President Harding both refused, for reasons which seemed to them sufficient, to carry out the mandate of Congress, and—I say it with all due respect—I do not believe they were justified in ignoring the provisions of that statute. Neither President Wilson nor President Harding was willing to give notice of the denouncement of these treaty provisions against discriminatory rates because they feared that such a course would lead to unnecessary involvements and embarrass our relations abroad. I do not believe this fear was or is justified; and, in any event, the failure to serve the notice was a violation of the law.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Sen-

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to suggest that perhaps immediately following the act of 1920, and shortly after the great world upheaval, when conditions were disturbed and upset all over the earth, there might have been reasons as early as that after the Great War for withholding the denunciation of these conventions or disturbing commercial relations; but it would seem that two years after that, when we are getting reasonably settled down to normal conditions, the same reasons might not obtain that obtained in 1920.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, that may be so. not want to speak unkindly about either of these Presidents, because I have not only a very great respect but a real affection for both of them. I think they made a mistake. That is my judgment. I think any Executive makes a mistake when he fails to enforce the statutes. In my judgment there is only one course to pursue. If he does not approve the spirit of a statute or its mandate, then he should ask Congress to repeal it.

TREATIES.

According to a report made by the Acting Secretary of State in 1919, preferential freight rates would affect 27 treaties made with 25 nations. All of these treaties save 7—with Argentina, China, Kongo, Costa Rica, Great Britain (treaty of 1794), Liberia, Panama, and Tripoli-specifically provide that they may be denounced upon notice, some within six months, others within twelve months.

It will be observed that there is only one of these seven nations that has a merchant marine, and that merchant marine carries nearly all of the commerce of the other six. Does anyone imagine that we would have any trouble in making a suitable arrangement with Argentina or China or Kongo or Costa Rica or Liberia or Panama or Tripoli? And bear in mind, please, that in 20 of these 27 treaties, at least, there is a provision to the effect that after a certain number of years, on the service of a notice of either 6 or 12 months, these treaties may be abrogated. Clearly, therefore, it was within the contemplation of the signatory powers that the economic condi-tions might so change that either party would be justified in asking for a denouncement of the treaties.

Time and again the United States, as well as other nations, has served notice of the abrogation of treaties. I doubt if any nation in the world has not done so. This fact is known to every student of international law. Of course, no treaty should be denounced except upon reasonable notice and for reasonable cause. As nearly all of these treaties specifically provide for abrogation upon notice, it is conclusive proof that the powers when signing and ratifying them fully realized there might be such a change in economic or international affairs as to require their modification or denouncement.

And now, Senators, let me pause to observe that every student of the law knows that as between the different nations a treaty is a contract. I think I am not wandering into the realm of imagination when I say that it is almost a partner-ship agreement—a partnership, if you please, at will, if there is no limitation therein. I understand, of course, that exception may be taken to that position; but when we supplement that thought with the further fact that every nation has at times denounced treaties, I think we are entitled to the privilege of doing it now, if necessary to carry out the purposes of our great Government.

I shall not pause to discuss these treaties which do not require the provision of notice save to say as to Great Britain that when she saw fit to adopt a policy of subsidizing her merchant marine she must have known that it was in effect a breach of faith.

If it shall be contended that Great Britain was justified in adopting her subsidy and subvention policy because of changed economic conditions, and notwithstanding our reciprocity agreement, in order to maintain her supremacy on the sea, United States can with like effect declare to the world that we kept our treaty obligations both in letter and in spirit, notwithstanding Great Britain's course, until less than perhaps 11 per cent of our oceanic commerce was carried in American bottoms and our merchant fleet was reduced to about 100,000 tons less than we had in 1810.

The World War came on, and at an expense of $3,000,000,000 we built our merchant marine of 7,000,000 tons. (See p. 416, Stat. Ab., 1921.) Economic conditions have changed throughout the world. We can not depend upon the carrying capacity of other nations. We built this fleet in order that we might help ourselves and our allies to win the war. We can not and we will not scrap it. We can no longer see ourselves at the mercy of other countries, and we propose to adopt a policy which our people will approve and which will help us to maintain ourselves upon the high seas. We know that in the past we did develop and maintain our merchant marine to its highest point of efficiency through the policy of preferential rates, and we ought not longer to deny ourselves the right to maintain this fleet by any plan that will meet the approval of our people.

When those who believe in discriminating charges favoring American bottoms urge legislation for that purpose they are met with the cry that it will provoke retaliatory measures by other nations. I do not believe it; but, if it does, we will meet it like men.

Whether this be true or not, will the power to retaliate on the part of foreign nations be lessened by the present plan? If we can vote thirty millions a year for subsidy, can not Great Britain increase the amount of her subsidies or subventions? To my mind it is absurd even to talk about retaliation. Let the American Nation assert itself, and this question will be solved.

I do not doubt, sirs, that if President Wilson had served the notice for the abrogation of these conventions and treaties, as he was required to do under the Jones Act, we would be over the crest of our difficulties. The same may be said of President Harding, had he carried out its provisions. I say it, with all due respect, that it was the duty of both these Presidents to comply with the law, and not to set up their individual judgments against the lawmaking power of the country. If either one or the other felt that the law was wrong, he should have advised its repeal.

Mr. President, is there a more opportune time to serve this notice of abrogation of these treaties than now? We are no longer a debtor Nation. We are a creditor Nation. We have a We are no larger commerce than any other nation in the world. commerce is ours, just as much as our manufacturing interests are our property and our concern. True, we want to buy from and sell to other nations; but we do not want to buy from them or sell to them one-half as badly as they want to buy from us and sell to us. A little bit of determination on the part of the Executive branch of the Government will settle this question.

Mr. President, I do not believe in the method of direct aid presented here. I do believe in a method of indirect aid, such as I have indicated, by discriminatory duties and tonnage charges. It can be brought about, and I want to make this appeal to Senators: Why should we not adopt the system under which we built up our merchant marine until it became the pride of the salted seas, rather than adopt a new method which is an innovation?

Mr. President, we talk about subsidies, subventions, bounties, They are adopted in other countries. present-and I want to make that clear if I have not thus far-Great Britain does not have a subsidy of this kind. Great Britain now has subventions, mail contracts. I have before me an extract from a speech made by the Undersecretary of State for Foreign Affairs in the debates in the House of Commons May 22, 1922, in which he says that the total annual payments made by the Government of Great Britain to their shipping interests amount to only £600,000, about $3,000,000 in our money.

I have on my desk here—I shall not take the time to refer to them—other statements indicating that the entire amount of money that is voted by the British Empire and her colonies for the purpose of encouraging the building of ships and the maintenance of their merchant marine will not exceed $10,000,000. I do not lose sight of the fact that some of these colonies spent more for the purpose of building their merchant marines during the period of the World War.

A statement upon this subject was made by Mr. E. T. Chamberlain, of the Department of Commerce, and was introduced in the Congressional Record by Congressman Edmonds, and will be found on page 224 of the Congressional Record under date of November 28, 1922. Anyone who wants the details can get them by referring to this number of the Congressional RECORD.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield. Mr. FLETCHER. I simply wish to suggest that that statement classifies as subsidy the entire cost of the building of the ships for Australia, and also for Canada.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator is exactly right, and I do not know why a public official should make a statement of that kind if he intended to have it believed that it was simply to cover the amount of money which was being expended for subsidies or subventions or bounties. Let me give a few further figures as indicating the amount of the subsidies.

France during the year 1922 spent for shipping purposes, including even some construction activities, navigation bounties, mail subventions, and so forth, only $4,924,650; Norway, $2,700,-000; Denmark, $229,256; Sweden, $1,108,984. The statement as to Italy is not entirely clear. It was a budget estimate of 1922-23, but the figures for Italy are given as $28,576,000; that was under war contracts, however. Japan spent $4,833,411; Brazil, $2,956,160; Spain, $3,300,214.

Now, we come in, and in one fell swoop attempt to authorize the payment out of the Public Treasury of $30,000,000 a year, more, I dare say, than is expended by all these nations combined, except perhaps Italy, for subventions, subsidies, ship bounties, and all.

I have always been firmly of the opinion that we should not drain the Public Treasury if there is any other reasonable method of accomplishing the same purpose, and that is my

I can imagine what a tremendous effect it would have if the President were to serve notices on the other nations of the world that we were going to abrogate these treaties and con-That would be half the battle, and after a little flurry, there would be no trouble of any kind, and we would see the beginning with the greatest merchant marine of the world.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator what he would think of a provision like this? I submitted an amendment on January 3 to strike out all after the enacting clause in this bill and insert:

A reduction of 10 per cent shall be made to the several rates of duties specified and imposed by the tariff act of 1922, in respect to all goods, wares, and merchandise which after the passage of this act shall be imported in ships or vessels of the United States.

All treaties and conventions in conflict herewith shall be denounced and terminated in accordance with their terms, and new treaties and conventions shall be entered into, conforming herewith, in their places.

Mr. POMERENE. In my judgment, that would be a better measure than the one that is pending; but, with all due respect, I do not feel it goes quite far enough. Bear in mind that in 1789 and during the earlier years of our history nearly every article of import was subject to a duty, and comparatively few of them-at least, a minority of them-were on the free list. Now two-thirds of the total commerce of the country consists of exports, one-third of imports, and of the imports perhaps twothirds in bulk or weight are on the free list and only about onethird in bulk or weight on the dutiable list. In my judgment, we could very greatly encourage the building and the mainte-nance of the merchant marine if we would adopt some system which would place a higher rate on the goods which are on the free list and which are carried to our shores in foreign bottoms.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President-

Mr. POMERENE. I yield. Mr. JONES of Washington. When the Underwood-Simmons tariff law was pending I offered an amendment that reads like

J. Subsec. 7. That upon all goods, wares, and merchandise imported under the provisions of this act in vessels not built or not registered prior to the passage of this act under the laws of the United States there shall be imposed and collected a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem in addition to the duties otherwise imposed by this act, and on such goods, wares, and merchandise as are otherwise admitted free there shall be imposed and collected a duty of 5 per cent ad valorem if imported in vessels not built or not registered under the laws of the United States: Provided, That the President is directed to cause to be abrogated, without unnecessary delay and in the manner therein provided, all treaties which contravene this provision; and until so abrogated this provision shall not apply to goods, wares, and merchandise imported in vessels affected by such treaties.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator was kind enough to call my

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator was kind enough to call my attention a moment ago to that, and by referring to the RECORD found that I was paired against that amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was not going to call attention to that.

Mr. POMERENE. I was. I have no recollection about it, and I do not know whether I was here at that time or not. It was tariff legislation, and it may be that I followed the party policy at that particular time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not intend to refrain from calling attention to it because I did not think the Senator wanted to have it brought out, but because I understand the situation about pairs, and every Member of the Senate understands it, while the public outside might not understand it.

Mr. POMERENE. If I was away, I may have given instructions to some one to protect me by a pair; but I do not remember about that. If the Senator will pardon me, I think that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Washington would be preferable to the suggestion of the Senator from Florida, for this reason, that while the amendment of the Senator from Florida would reduce the tariff rates on goods which come in American bottoms, that might serve to reduce the revenue. The amendment which the Senator from Washington has just read provides for an increase in the duties on all dutiable articles which come in foreign bottoms, and the effect of it would be, if they come in, to increase the revenue.

More than that, I think the suggestion of the Senator from Washington to place a small duty on goods now on the free list which come in foreign bottoms would very materially aid our merchant marine. In other words, by this method we are building a fence about our own commerce, and saying "This is ours for the American merchant marine, flying the American flag, and manned by American men."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think it would be interesting to put the vote in here on this amendment. The yeas were 8, the nays were 42.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Washington at that time seemed to have been a John the Baptist crying in the wilderness, but he has a great many followers now, and I only wish he were leading along the same lines. If so, I would gladly follow him.

Mr. FLETCHER. Perhaps it was thought that that provision in the bill as it came over was sufficient to cover the situation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator does not remember the circumstances

Mr. POMERENE. I do not recall the circumstances.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I call his attention now to this fact, that there was such a provision in the bill as it came from the House, and I think the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. Underwood), who was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee at that time, had much to do, of course, with putting the provision in. This provision was in the bill as it came from the House:

J. Subsec. 7. That a discount of 5 per cent on all duties imposed by this act shall be allowed on such goods, wares, and merchandise as shall be imported in vessels admitted to registration under the laws of the United States.

The Finance Committee of the Senate, however, reported the bill to the Senate, striking that provision out entirely and substituting nothing for it, and on the vote on the committee amendment the yeas were 41 and the nays were 12. In other words, the committee amendment striking out all reference to the discriminating duties was adopted by the Senate by a vote of 41 to 12.

Mr. FLETCHER. But the act of 1913 did carry a provision for discriminating duties.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It went to conference, and there was a final revision.

Mr. POMERENE. And then it was so modified that it would not apply to any nation with which we had a treaty or a convention.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator is right.

Mr. FLETCHER. In connection with the amendment I proposed, I am inclined to think the Senator's suggestion is sounder on the general proposition, but I could not have the heart to increase the duties fixed in the act of 1922. They are certainly high enough and I only hope we can reduce them.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize what the Senator had in mind. I want now to present, in a very general way, a plan which, in my judgment, will solve the problem and will help us to preserve our present merchant marine and maintain it on the sea. There is nothing new in it, because each of these thoughts has been presented by others in the past, but this is what ought to be done, in my judgment:

First. Provide more favorable tonnage rates for ships of American registry than those of foreign registry.

Second. Reduce the rates of duty on all articles on the dutiable list coming in American bettoms or raise the rates on those coming in foreign bottoms, or both.

Third. If necessary, add a slight duty on all goods on the free list imported in foreign bottoms. As most of the goods on the free list come from countries which do not have merchant ships, this would give a very decided advantage to American ships.

Fourth. On all goods exported give reduced rates on railroads from point of production to port of shipment, providing they are sent in ships of American registry. This would secure to them the tonnage and reduce the cost of transportation for the producer.

May I stop here to observe that the geographic situation in our country is very materially different from that of most other countries, and particularly is that true as applied to agricultural products. In Argentina and Australia, for instance, the distance from the farms to the ports is seldom greater than 250 miles, while in this country of ours our farm produce must be shipped a thousand, fifteen hundred, perhaps twenty hundred miles, or farther, in order to get to a port of export.

Fifth. If necessary grant a decrease in railroad rates on goods imported in American bottoms from the port of entry to the point of destination

Sixth. Provide by law that after a fixed date all ships belonging to the Government shall be sold or leased, and in no event operated by the Government in competition with privately owned ships.

This plan, of course, would require the denouncement upon notice of all treaties or conventions which provide for reciprocal traffic or tariff rates, and the necessary notices ought to be

So far as these suggestions which apply to railroad rates are concerned, they are substantially what is contained in section 28 of the merchant marine act of 1920.

No effort has been made under either administration to carry out the provisions of the act of 1920. I am at a loss to under-stand why now we should discard what was then the will of the Congress of the United States and adopt a plan of subsidy which would cost this Government $30,000,000 annually without giving us any assurance of success.

We can accomplish the same result for the American merchant marine by indirect aid along the lines I have pointed out. Then why drain the Public Treasury?

During the delivery of Mr. Pomerene's speech, Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I would like very much to hear what the Senator is saying. He always contributes to a debate by his speeches, and I can not hear him, although I am within a few feet of his desk. I hope we may have order in the Senate

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. Mr. CURTIS. While the Senator is interrupted, may I ask leave to submit a unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business to-day, it recess until 11 o'clock to-

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator at what hour will the recess be taken?

Mr. CURTIS. As soon as the Senator from Ohio concludes his speech. Mr. ROBINSON. Pending the request for unanimous consent, I will state that a number of Senators have expressed impatience at the inability of the Senate to sound out the calendar. We are rapidly approaching the time when proceeding with the consideration of the calendar will accomplish nothing, especially as far as relates to Senate bills. Some Senators have expressed a desire to have an adjournment taken this evening. I shall not object to the request of the Senator from Kansas if he thinks it best to take a recess, but I call to his attention and to the attention of other Senators the fact that taking a recess will practically end the consideration of the calendar.

Mr. CURTIS. I will state to the Senator that it was my intention to ask to-morrow or the next day for time to go throught the calendar, at least for the disposition of unobjected bills. It is impossible to dispose of any bills where there is a contest. I think, if we take a recess, we can reach some agreement to-morrow morning about the calendar.

Mr. OVERMAN. Can not the Senator have it limited to House bills?

Mr. CURTIS. We will try to reach some agreement in regard to that matter to-morrow.

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly no further Senate bills need be passed for they would not be considered in the other House. If we could limit the consideration of the calendar to House bills, we could accomplish something.

Mr. POMERENE. This is all very interesting, and if we can get to a unanimous-consent agreement I am willing to yield further; otherwise, I wish to proceed.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent to have the order

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

After the conclusion of Mr. Pomerene's speech,

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess under the order until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) under the order previously entered took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 27, 1923, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, February 26, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Clerk of the House.

The CLERK. The clerk will read a communication from the Speaker's room.

FEBRUARY 26, 1923.

To the CLERK OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

I have an attack of influenza and so am unable to leave the house, and designate Hon. Philip P. Campbell of Kansas to act as Speaker pro tempore until I return.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas took the chair.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who dwellest in the eternities, we would unite our breath with the countless hosts in saying "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty!" Let us thank Thee deeply and devoutly for the lessons Thou hast written everywhere, and do Thou enable us to heed them. Still, still with Thee in the freshness and promise of another day. Walk with us that we fail not and turn not aside. Strengthened by Thy presence, led by Thy wisdom, cheered by Thy promise, and helped by Thy grace, may we do our whole duty to our country and to our fellow man. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday and Sunday were read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent (on request of Mr. Cockran)-Mr. Cullen was granted leave of absence on account of illness in family.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker—
Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker—
The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14408, a bill making appropriations for deficiencies.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the deficiency bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order, if the Chair will permit me to state the point of order. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that this being the fourth Monday of February, under clause 8 of rule 24, which reads as follows:

The second and fourth Mondays of each month, after the disposal of such business on the Speaker's table as requires reference only, shall, when claimed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, be set apart for the consideration of such business as may be presented by said committee.

I want to call to the attention of the Speaker that the only exception to this rule is found in the last paragraph of the Manual, which reads as follows:

On District days it is in order to go into the Committee of the Whole to consider revenue or general appropriation bills.

That was passed in the Sixty-first Congress. Now I want to submit that the chairman of the District of Columbia Committee has claimed to-day, and that the bill which the gentleman from Illinois seeks to call up is not a general appropriation bill, such as that term is used in this paragraph, but is a special bill, to wit, the third deficiency bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. The general appropriation bills are the regular supply bills. The deficiency appropriation bills that come from time to time are not the general appropriation bills. They are special bills of emergency, made necessary by the fact that certain departments have exceeded their authority and have violated the law in expending more money than the Congress had authorized. They are special appropriation bills in effect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. BLANTON. I have one other point.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule.
Mr. BLANTON. Will the Chair permit me to make another point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; the Chair is ready to

Mr. FOCHT. May I make a parliamentary inquiry before the Chair makes his ruling?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. I want to inquire, as chairman of the District Committee, Mr. Speaker, whether it is within the power of any official of any committee or any committee to set aside a rule of the House without the consent of the House when the chairman of the committee and the committee are here with a bill, the school teachers' bill and-

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will answer the inquiry. The House will decide on the motion or the gentleman from Illinois and give answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BLANTON. I desire to make another point of order.

This should be in order at any time—
Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, there is a point of order before the Chair and until that is determined no other point of order is in order.

Mr. BLANTON. I have another one that is a better point of order and more conclusive. [Laughter.] I make the point of order that in addition to the House rule which I have read, the Committee on Rules, which makes the order of business in this House, several days ago passed a special rule which makes in order what is known as the teachers' pay bill, and that rule is in the chairman's pocket at this time and is in order to be called up and that makes in order the District business to-day. The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for order in the galleries.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay that appeal on the table.

Mr. BLANTON. I appeal from the decision of the Chair—
Mr. MONDELL. I move to lay the appeal on the table.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas appeals from the decision of the Chair about something of which the Chair is not exactly aware—
Mr. BLANTON. That the teachers' pay bill, for which the Committee on Rules has granted a special rule, is in order on this special District day.

Mr. MADDEN. It is not until it is laid before the House,
Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, there is no opinion to appeal from. There is only one motion before the House and that is the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. But if there is a motion before the House made by the gentle-man from Texas [Mr. Blanton] to override the decision of the Chair, I move to lay it on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order made by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, pending that, I would like the Chair to admonish the people in the galleries that they are only here as a matter of courtesy, and they are not entitled to order. to attempt to stampede the House. We are entitled to order in the galleries.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will enforce the rules of the House, and notifies the people in the galleries that they are here by the courtesy of the House, and that they must observe order. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mad-DEN] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the deficiency bill, and the gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois may not make that motion to-day, for the reason that it is the fourth Monday in the month.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rules specifically provide that it is in order to move on this day to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of a general appropriation bill, and it has always been held, as the gentleman from Texas will find, that a deficiency appropriation bill is a general appropriation bill. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from

Mr. BLANTON. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. MONDELL. I move to lay that on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to lay the appeal on the table. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 103, noes 14.

So the motion to lay the appeal on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I want to ask the Chair if the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Madden] to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the deficiency bill is subject to amendment? If so, I wish to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not. It must be voted up

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLANTON. Should the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] be voted down, would it be in order for the Speaker to entertain the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Fochr]?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Any proper motion would be in order

Mr. MONDELL. Any other proper motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Madden] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14408, the deficiency bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I voted a moment ago to sustain the view of the Speaker because I thought he was correct in interpreting the rules. But is there any possible method of find-ing out when the teachers' pay bill will be brought before the

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is unable to answer that question.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for recognition on the

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (suggested by the Chair) there were-ayes 86, noes 46. Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present, and I challenge the vote on that

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and challenges the vote on that ground. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. As many as are in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 172, nays 184, answered "present" 2, not voting 119, as follows:

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. McARTHUR in the chair.

The Clerk read the title to the bill, as follows:

H. R. 14408, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, as follows: EMPLOYEES' COMPENSATION COMMISSION

For the payment of compensation provided by "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes." approved September 7, 1916, including medical, sungical, and hospital services, and supplies provided by section 9, and the transportation and burial expenses provided by sections 9 and 11 and advancement of costs for the enforcement of recoveries provided in sections 26 and 27, where necessary, accruing during the fiscal year 1923 or in prior fiscal years, $475,000.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if this item takes care of people outside of the regular service? Mr. MADDEN. This is the Industrial Employees' Compensation Commission.

What class of employees does it refer to? Mr. SNELL.

Mr. MADDEN. All classes of civilian employees.

Mr. SNELL. Outside of the regular service?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out line 8. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to strike out line 8, page 6.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have moved to strike out in this bill the words "the District of Columbia" because apparently it has ceased to have any place in the legislative program of the House. The people of the District of Columbia have no voice in the selection of their commissioners or in their local affairs.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not talking to the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking to my amendment, wherein I move to strike out "the District of Columbia."

Mr. MADDEN. The District of Columbia is too big to strike out by a motion.

Mr. BLANTON. I am trying to do some big things in this House, but I do not always succeed; still I am trying.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that the gentleman from Texas is not discussing the bill. The gentleman from Texas will be allowed to discuss under his motion the business of the District of Columbia embodied in this bill and nothing else when the point of order

Mr. BLANTON. Our friend from Illinois is becoming very

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Texas is always technical and I get technical only once in awhile.

Mr. BLANTON. I watched the gentleman from Illinois one day for four hours-

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order—Mr. BLANTON. I am getting back to the bill.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will proceed

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, under the subject "District of Columbia" in this bill there appears certain items for expense under the subhead "General expenses." The general The general expenses for the District of Columbia pertain to the business of the District of Columbia. No people ought to be taxed to meet the general expenses unless they have some voice in the management of their own business.

The people of the District of Columbia are by this bill required to pay 60 per cent of the expenditures under this subhead. Yet they can not elect their District Commissioners, they can not select the members of their own school board.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. They can not elect their Public Utility Commission, which sits here day after day and makes the people pay 8 cents car fare when they ought not to pay but 5 cents under the charter granted the street railways. Mr. MADDEN. There is nothing in the bill about that.

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking about general expenses. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks under the term "general expenses" there must be some liberality.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BLANTON. I prefer not to yield now, I prefer not to yield even to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] if the Chairman can keep me from it. [Laughter.] regard to these items, the 450,000 people of this District must look solely to the membership of this Congress for their protection and their rights.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will yield to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman from Texas know that under the rules of the House the pending bill is in order and deals with the entire Government of the United States?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and the District of Columbia is only very small part of the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. If the District of Columbia is greater than all the activities of the Government we ought to go on with that bill, but, if not, let us go on with this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I am for the Government first always, but I am for the District of Columbia on District day,

Mr. MADDEN. It is not District day. Mr. BLANTON. No; it has been decided that it is not District day, but there are other items that could have been placed in the bill by the distinguished gentleman without strenuously violating the rules. I do not believe he would have had any trouble if, for instance, he had placed the teachers' pay bill in this bill, and I would have made no point of order against it, and it would have gone through. It would have benefited the people of this District and they would have secured their rights.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes. I ask the gentleman to make it 10 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, the gentleman can take it on the next paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.
Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I object.
Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman Is there objection?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recog-

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the motion is out of order, because the gentleman from Wyoming had already been recognized, and he can not be taken off his feet without permission.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I waive any rights that have in the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming waives his The question is on the motion of the rights in the premises. gentleman from Illinois that all debate upon the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that by extending it 10 minutes, the other 5 minutes to be given to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order. He can not specify particularly the possess. harly the person.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama is out of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by making it 10 minutes.

The question is on the amendment of the The CHAIRMAN. gentleman from Alabama to make it 10 minutes.

The question was taken; and the Chair being in doubt, the committee divided and there were-ayes 57, noes 71.

So the Bankhead amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois that debate upon the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LINTHICUM) there were—ayes 76, noes 35.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we all very greatly regret that the short session of the Congress is of such brief dura-

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming has not proceeded sufficiently for the Chair to determine whether he is speaking in order or not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we all regret that the short session of Congress is not of sufficient duration to enable us to dispose of all of the public business before us, including the business of the District of Columbia. At the short session it is absolutely essential that we shall pass the appropriation bills, and to that work this House devoted itself constantly, earnestly, and faithfully, with the cooperation of both sides of the Chamber, making a record in that regard. We then took up only the absolutely essential and important public business

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order that the gentleman from Wyoming is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Only the essential public business during that period-

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that when a gentleman having the floor is called to order, he must cease speaking until the Chair determines the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the gentle-man from Wyoming is discussing matters more general than those contained in the amendment. The gentleman will proceed

Mr. MONDELL. During that period, after disposing of the appropriation bills, the business of the District of Columbia was given more time upon this floor than all of the business of the Army and the Navy, than all of the business of the Banking and Currency Committee; than all of the business of the great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, during that period— Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, respectfully, that even the House leader should obey the rules and the ruling of the Chair. He is not discussing the items of appropriation contained in this bill; and the point of order which the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. RANKIN, made, which was sustained by the Chair, should compel the gentleman to speak in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the Chair was very liberal in the latitude which he permitted other gentlemen in the discussion of this matter; and since the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming has been called to it, he feels that the gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. But two wrongs never make a right. Mr. MONDELL. Of course, Mr. Chairman, others than the gentleman from Texas are always wrong.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed out of order.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if the speech of the gentleman from Wyoming is intended as an apology to the people of the District of Columbia, he better have a meeting outside for that purpose.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have permission to proceed out of order.

Mr. MONDELL. I object. I do not wish to proceed out of Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. BLANTON. I cheet.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I object.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.
Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming is proceeding in order to discuss the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman from Wyoming is discussing the District of Columbia. The District of Columbia has had more time for legislation on the floor of this House since we disposed of the appropriation bills than any one of the great departments of the Federal Government. The Dis-trict of Columbia Committee has upon its calendars some 12 or 13 bills. For instance, there is a bill for the compulsory attendance of children in schools. Then there is the bill—

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the appropriations in this bill and is out of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly I am not discussing the appropriations in this bill, and the amendment that the gentleman offered has nothing to do with the appropriations in this bill The amendment is to the caption, "The District of Columbia," and a discussion of the District of Columbia is in order.

Mr. BLANTON. But we have a parliamentarian from the State of Oregon in the chair who thinks otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. MONDELL. Why is it, Mr. Chairman, that we have delegations here in favor of but one of the 13 or 14 bills from the District of Columbia that are on the calendar? Is there no one in the District of Columbia interested in all of the other legislation affecting all of the people of the District? Is it legislation affecting only a very few of the people that the people here are interested in? Here is a list of the bills reported by the District Committee and not acted upon:

LEGISLATION FROM THE COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. H. R. 8084. Closing certain streets and alleys in vicinity of Walter Reed Hospital. (Unfinished business.) S. 2040. Compulsory school attendance of children in District of Columbia.

H. R. 4389. Creating traffic court in District of Columbia.
S. 3136. School teachers' salary bill.

Columbia.

H. R. 10275. Authorizing extension of park system in District of Columbia. H. R. 14184. Authorizing closing of a part of Thirty-fourth Place

H. R. 14184. Authorizing closing of a part of Thirty-fourth Place NW.
H. R. 18237. Authorizing closing of portions of Grant Road.

H. R. 12172. Regulating payunbrokers in District of Columbia.
S. Con. Res. 26. Investigation of needs of office of recorder of deeds of District of Columbia.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I again make the point of order, and I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Wyoming want to know why these bills are not here? Simply because the gentleman and his autocratic committee have strangled them

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no Member of the House who is impervious to the rules of the House, and the gentleman from Wyoming is disobeying the ruling of the Chair. I ask that the Chair keep him

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order. Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to argue the point of order if there is a point of order. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. MONDELL. I prefer to argue the point of order if there is any question about my being in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair admonished the gentleman from Texas to keep his discussion within the general principles carried in the present bill under the head of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the Chair be good enough to have the Clerk report the amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. The Chair would not permit me to make the remarks I wanted to make, and I still want to make them. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be again reported, without objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MONDELL. What is line 8? The CHAIRMAN. The District of Columbia. Mr. MONDELL. The District of Columbia Committee has some 13 or 14 important bills on its calendar providing for compulsory attendance of children, providing for tax on motorvehicle fuel, providing for amendment to the insurance laws of the District-

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not wish to be contentious, but I do wish the rules of the House enforced.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already ruled that discussion must be confined to the subject of legislation.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the Chair any power to keep gentlemen within the rules?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not tell what the gentleman is going to discuss until he discusses it.

Mr. MONDELL. I would like to have a ruling. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming and all other gentlemen must discuss, if points of order are made-

Mr. MONDELL. Under the language which is proposed to strike out, is it in order to discuss the District or not?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to discuss legislative matter pertaining to the District carried in this bill, and the Chair has so ruled in respect to the gentleman from Texas who endeavored to broaden the discussion generally.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. How much time has the gentleman remaining?

Mr. MADDEN. I make a point of order that gentlemen can not submit a parliamentary inquiry and take a gentleman off his feet.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the gentleman from Wyoming will proceed.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, nobody appears to be interested in any legislation of the District of Columbia, important as it is, reported here on the calendar, except legislation affecting a few individuals. Have we reached the time when Congress is to be governed in its legislation not in view of the importance of public business but by approval from the galleries?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected. The Clerk read as follows:

> DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. GENERAL EXPENSES.

Plumbing inspection division: For temporary employment of additional assistant inspectors of plumbing and laborers for such time as their services may be necessary, fiscal year 1923, $1,000.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman-

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. RANKIN. I move to strike out the last word. We are proceeding here at a breakneck speed, as the gentleman from Wyoming could have said or should have said, in the closing days of this Congress with a measure still pending that, in my opinion, is of infinitely more importance to the taxpayers of America than the bill we are now discussing. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish] has introduced a resolution to investigate the Veterans' Bureau along certain lines. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] has introduced one asking for a joint investigation—that is, by a joint committee between the House and Senate.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the item.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be heard.
Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I am not surprised—
Mr. MADDEN. This is an item for plumbing inspection divi-When we reach that part of the bill, why it will be in

Mr. RANKIN. I wish to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. RANKIN. And in that connection I should like to have a copy of the bill. I wish to say I am not surprised that the leaders on the Republican side object to the Veterans' Bureau being investigated.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not confining his remarks to the item.

Mr. RANKIN. We have the Veterans' Bureau prominently before the House and-

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I insist on my point of order, We are not dealing with the Veterans' Bureau in this item.
Mr. RANKIN. On page 6 we have passed over the item dealing with the Veterans' Bureau, and it is to that item I wish to direct my remarks.

Mr. MADDEN. That has been passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule, The Chair thinks debate must be confined to the subject—

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I most obediently submit to the will of the Chair, because the last word that I moved to strike out, I believe, is "Commissioners," and if there is anyone

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair finish.

Mr. RANKIN. This is not to be taken out of my time. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moved to strike out the last word and then engages in a wide discussion. The point of order being made against the gentleman's discussion, the Chair is constrained to sustain the point of order, and the gentleman must discuss the amendment, which is the striking out of the last word.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LONDON. The last word is "dollars," and the trouble with the Veterans' Bureau seems to be in relation to dollars.

[Laughter.]

Mr. RANKIN. Yes. Mr. Chairman, if there is any one thing that the American people are interested in at this time, in the dying days of this extravagant Congress, it is dollars, and God knows, I do not blame them. Look at the dollars you are wasting here! Five hundred million dollars is being spent annually by the Veterans' Bureau, or more than the entire Federal Government was costing the people of the United States 20 years ago. You are spending that on the Veterans' Bureau alone. You are spending possibly $200,000,000 a year in waste or extravagance of those dollars we are talking about. The taxpayers must foot the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi object to that expenditure?

Mr. RANKIN. I do not object, as I have stated on the floor of the House before, to money that is legitimately spent to take care of these men; but every man who has investigated the Veterans' Bureau is bound to know that vast amounts—possibly $200,000,000 or $300,000,000—of the people's money is being wasted or extravagantly spent by this bureau.

Mr. MADDEN. I deny it. Mr. RANKIN. Give us an investigation, as the Senate is going to do. Make it a joint investigation, and you will see these large expenditures and this waste in the sale of Government material, and cases where $150,000 and $100,000 is being paid annually in various places for office rent, and you will find a great concourse of officeholders that have been appointed—pork-barrel men connected with the Veterans' Bureau. You will find when it is done that millions if not hundreds of millions of dollars are being wasted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it is, of course, all very well for gentlemen to get up on the floor and say that between $200,000,000 and $300,000,000 out of the $500,000,000 appropriated for the support of the Veterans' Bureau is being wasted. But I challenge gentlemen to prove it.

Mr. RANKIN. If you will give us this investigation we will prove it. That is all we ask—that you give us the investigation.

Mr. MADDEN. In the first place, we are paying $90,000,000 for premiums to make up the difference between the amount of the premiums paid by the men and the amount that is required to be paid to cover the losses. That is one charge every year. We are paying about $178,000,000 a year for vocational training.

Does the gentleman want vocational training for the men who were wounded in the service? We are paying compensation to the men who were wounded in the service. I will put the figures in. I do not recall them exactly now, and we are paying for hospitalization to an amount that will bring the sum total up to what we have shown is being paid. I do not say that the Veterans' Bureau is being conducted as efficiently as it ought to be or as economically as it ought to be, nor do I say that it is honest in every particular; but I do say that there is no such saving possible as the gentleman from Mississippi says.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, if

Mr. BLANTON. If allow me—

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman can make his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that we have passed the Veterans' Bureau item and that the paragraphs under the District of Columbia are being read, and the gentle-man is now speaking out of order in discussing the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. MADDEN. I agree that I am speaking out of order, but I am speaking in reply to the gentleman from Mississippi, who was permitted to go on out of order.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just a word on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Connecticut. Mr. TILSON. I think the Chair has laid down the correct rule as to the limitation of debate under the five-minute rule, and we ought to observe the rule. I do not think that because we have a large gallery to-day it is justifiable excuse for us to act like a lot of schoolboys. [Applause.]

The subterfuge of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Ran-KIN] and that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], for that matter, were after all but subterfuges to evade the rule.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Connecticut is not discussing the point of order. He is indulging in personalities.

Mr. TILSON. I was simply illustrating my contention by referring to the remarks made by the distinguished gentlemen from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] and Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], thereby showing that they were not discussing matters contained in this bill. They ought to limit themselves to such matters and we ought to leave these side issues alone until we can finish this appropriation bill.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to see the rules enforced in regard to this matter of debate. Whenever a Member is in good faith discussing the bill, all right; but when he resorts to a subterfuge or to any other expedient in order to discuss extraneous matters, then some one should object.

Mr. MADDEN, I will say to the gentleman from Connecticut that I have no desire to discuss any matter that is not pending, but I did not think it was fair to let go what the gentleman from Mississippi said without some response. He said we were squandering from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000 a year in the Veterans' Bureau. I deny it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. TILSON. I insist on the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman yield? Mr. TILSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman from Connecticut, who knows everything about parliamentary law, know of any rule that will make the majority leader and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations obey the rule?

Mr. TILSON. I am trying to help the gentleman on his points of order.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to what has been said.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has something to say on this atter. The gentleman from Hilmois [Mr. Madden] has the matter.

Mr. MADDEN. I have surrendered the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas made a point of order on the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, and the gentleman from Connecticut rose to discuss the point of order. The gentleman from Illinois then took his seat, and that vitiated the entire proceeding. The Chair will take this occa-sion to admonish gentlemen and remind them of the fact that we have under consideration an important bill, and whenever a Member moves to strike out the last word he must confine himself to matters pending before the committee or else get unanimous consent before attempting to discuss other matters. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For allowance to principals of grade school buildings for services rendered as such, in addition to their grade salary, to be paid in strict conformity with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia," approved June 20, 1906, fiscal year 1923, $2,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to ask the gentleman from Illinois some questions. I notice that this paragraph provides for principals of grade school buildings in accordance with the act approved June 20, 1906.

Mr. MADDEN. They are allowed $30 a year for every room under their jurisdiction.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask where there has been any change in this teachers' act since June 20, 1906?

Mr. MADDEN. Not as to this.
Mr. BLANTON. In any other matters?
Mr. MADDEN. Yes; in other matters but not as to this.
Mr. BLANTON. Why insist on putting this provision in the statute until what is known as the Zihlman bill comes up?

Mr. MADDEN. We do not know anything about the Zihlman bill in bills that we report; we only take cognizance of the law as it exists.

Mr. BLANTON. That being the case, why does the gentleman put $6,000,000 into this bill for raising the turrets on 13 battleships when the bill that provides for it is in a pigeonhole?

Mr. MADDEN. The existing law authorizes us to do it.
Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman thinks that, does he?
Mr. MADDEN. I do not think; I know it.
Mr. BLANTON. That will be left to the chairman when the time comes. May I ask this—I do not care to make the point of order expression.

Mr. MADDEN. It is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. But the Zihlman bill—

Mr. MADDEN. I am not the father of the Zihlman bill.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentieman is the high mogu But the gentleman is the high mogul of the steering committee.

Mr. MADDEN. No; I am not on the steering committee. do not make the arrangements for the conduct of business of the House; I am doing the best I can to take care of the business that comes before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLANTON. I think that myself, Mr. Chairman, and I withdraw the point of order. The Clerk read as follows:

For textbooks and school supplies for use of pupils of the first eight grades, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1923, $15,000.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amend-

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CABLE: Page 9, after line 14, insert a new para-

 "For salaries of teachers of the Americanization work of foreigners in night classes, at not to exceed $3.50 per teacher per night, $2,730." Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that that is legislation unauthorized by law.

Mr. CABLE. Will the gentleman reserve it?
Mr. BLANTON. Zes; I will.
Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, in my time I would like to have the Clerk read the following article.

The Clerk read as follows:

AMERICANIZATION WORK FACES LACK OF FUNDS,

The Americanization work faces Lack of funds.

The Americanization classes of the District public schools must close April 30 unless Congress passes an emergency appropriation, it was announced to-day.

Closing of the schools will also cause discontinuance of the homeservice work, teaching of rules of sanitation and health to the immigrant housewives.

Miss Maude E. Aiton, principal of the Americanization schools, warned of the impending closing in a letter sent to-day to Arthur C. Moses, chairman of the Americanization Association of the District.

My CAPLE I hope that registers the general like

Mr. CABLE. I hope that neither the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who is chairman of the Appropriations Committee, nor the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton] will insist on the point of order. This amendment provides funds to pay teachers who are engaged in teaching the foreign born so that they may become American citizens. If the amendment fails these night classes must close before the end of the year. The appropriation has been approved by the President through the last Budget and is for important work.

Will the gentleman yield? Mr. MADDEN.

Mr. CABLE. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. When was it approved by the Budget? It has not come to us.

Mr. CABLE. It went to the Senate. This bill was already printed when the President was ready to transmit this last Budget to Congress

It was none other than Theodore Roosevelt himself who, realizing that the basis of good citizenship was a knowledge of English, in his last public message, said:

We have room for but one language here; that is the English language, for we intend to see that the crucible turns our people out as Americans, of American nationality, and not as dwellers in a polyglot boarding house; and we have room for but one soul loyalty, and that is a loyalty to the American people.

The amendment I have just offered is for the purpose of aiding in carrying out the wish of that great American, that ours shall be a Nation of people of one nationality—Americans— and speaking but one language—English. This can only be ac-complished by the education of the alien already here and by basing future immigration upon citizenship qualifications. When we stop to consider that there are 14,000,000 foreign born now in the United States, that less than half are naturalized, that 3,000,000 of the 14,000,000 are not able to speak English, and that an additional 3,000,000 are unable to read English, the size and importance of the work can be appreciated. The law does not compel an alien residing here to become an American We want no forced citizenship; rather should he recitizen. turn to his native land. For those who wish to become Americans Congress, among other things, has seen fit to prescribe certain qualifications.

In order that the alien may learn what America means and what the privileges and duties of American citizenship are, he must be able to speak the English language. English is the language of the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and the constitutions of the varions States, of our laws and city ordinances, of our court decisions, newspapers, periodicals, history, poetry, the ballot. It is our means of communication in business and in societythe language of commerce and industry.

Until about seven years ago no sense of responsibility, no duty or obligation was felt by the American people toward the foreigner, except by a few. He was turned loose to drift. It was thought that as the privilege of coming here had been extended, the responsibility ended. An elementary education was considered in the same class as the measles—something to which only children are subject. During the war, however,

Federal active participation began.

On May 10, 1915, at Philadelphia a reception was held for 4,000 "newly made citizens." The President of the United States, the Secretary of Labor, and other officials of the Nation and State were there. Later Congress passed an act imposing upon the Bureau of Naturalization the duty of sending the names of the candidates for citizenship to the public schools in each particular locality. It also authorized the distribution of free citizenship textbooks to the candidates who attended these public schools. The Chief of the Bureau of Naturalization is Commissioner Raymond C. Crist, as able a chief as there is in any branch of the Federal Government. He believes and spreads the gospel preached by Thomas Jefferson that "Elementary education is an inherent right of all in a democracy.'

If this amendment is not agreed to the night classes must soon close. The naturalization courts operate throughout the year, so should the schools continue. The education of the hundreds of men and women will stop. Aside from the board of education, many prominent people, appreciating the need of naturalizing the alien, take an active part in that work. Mr. Arthur C. Moses, a business man of Washington, heads a committee of over a hundred, and devotes a great deal of his valuable time to this particular work. All the judges of the Supreme Court of the District serve on that committee, and there is a board of directors representing various organizations such as the American Legion, United States Chamber of Commerce, D. A. R., Woman's Civic Clubs, Y. W. C. A., Federation of Citizens' Associations, and the like.

I had the privilege of visiting some of the night classes. There I saw foreign-born men and women sitting at desks seeking an education so that they might become American citizens,

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Yes. Mr. CABLE.

Mr. McKENZIE. About what are the ages of the pupils at these schools? I have been informed that last year they had one gentleman over 80 years old.

Mr. CABLE. I would not be surprised at that, but the average age of these students will not exceed 25 years. They work in the daytime and attend classes three nights a week.

Mr. LINTHICUM. About how many pupils attend night schools?

Mr. CABLE. The total enrollment has been something like 1,700 or 1.800 a year, and the classes run from 40 to 50 pupils.

Mr. LINTHICUM. And they need only an additional $2,000? And they need only an additional $2,000? Mr. CABLE. They need $2,730 to carry on the work for the balance of this year. I trust no point of order will be made on this particular amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has almost convinced me, and I withdraw my reservation of the objection. Mr. CABLE. Miss Maude Aiton, principal of the work, advises that when the night classes began it was necessary to advertise these schools by printing cards and distributing them among the foreign born. Now, in four years the classes are all overcrowded. Mr. O. T. Moore, chief naturalization ex-aminer for the district, including the District of Columbia, devotes three nights a week to quizzing the advance classes in preparation for their examination in court for citizenship.

STATE EDUCATIONAL WORK

It is interesting to know of the work carried on in the various tates. North Dakota has adopted the slogan "No illiteracy in North Dakota in 1924."

South Dakota Legislature appropriates funds to assist local communities and engages graduates in Americanization work to teach the foreign born. The appreciation shown by the adult pupils is one of the most gratifying features of the work there. At McIntosh the evening school petitioned the board of education to provide for five sessions instead of two per week.

A "Finn" rural evening school in Brown County rural evening school in Brown County reported a perfect attendance to the entire session. Butter, eggs, cream, and milk were provided the teachers without charge. A banker and mik were provided the teachers without charge. A banker in Tripp tells of being stopped at 10.10 p. m. by an evening foreign-born school pupil who insisted on reading an interesting lesson by the light of a lamp-post. Matt Lutgen, a "graduate" of the Aberdeen evening school, developed a rather exceptional control over English and appreciation of America, result-Ing in his being called to address State conferences of educators, Rotary Clubs, and other meetings. I want to quote from M. M. children in the public schools. A home teacher is expected to be Guhin, who is an active and efficient director of Americanization and civic training. He says:

What we need is not a better English week but a century of better English in which a generation will arise with respect for the lan-guage of America as well as a respect for its flag and its Govern-

In Massachusetts also there is a State aid law. The enrollment has increased from 3,000 to 22,000 since its enactment.

Connecticut also bears a part of the expense, paying $4 for each pupil in average attendance of 75 per cent of the sessions The State director has the assistance in approved schools. of a bureau of foreign-language speakers, comprised of American citizens of foreign birth.

In Ohio the need of this education is recognized by law. There is no State aid, but the boards of education realize the need of evening schools and the benefits derived therefrom. The greatest difficulty comes in financing the project. Several citles experimented with the charging of a fee and found it had very little effect in decreasing the number of registrants. Beginning the school year, October, 1922, practically every city charged tultion to the amount of making the schools entirely or partially self-supporting. The result of this fee system has been that attendance is greatly stabilized. There is not the usual discrepancy between enrollment and average daily attendance. Different fees are charged, such as $1 registration, 50 cents a month, $2 for 12 weeks. Mr. E. C. Vermillion is supervisor of the division of Americanization, and is accomplishing a great deal of good in the education of the foreign born.

The State of Utah provides for compulsory attendance upon public evening-school classes of persons between the ages of 10 and 45 who can not use the English language, and maintains an appropriation to carry out this work.

In California a law was passed providing for the establishment of classes of citizenship applicants and it was made the duty of the county clerk to furnish the schools each month with the names and addresses of all such candidates.

The following States have passed laws providing for allen education: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Idaho, Iowa, Maine Massachusetts, Minnesota, Montana, Nevada, New Jersey, New Hampshire, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, Wyoming, and West Virginia.

INDEPENDENT CITIZENSHIP FOR WOMEN.

The present Congress passed a law granting independent citizenship to women. No foreign-born woman becomes a citizen because she marries an American citizen or because of the naturalization of her husband. She must petition and appear in court for her own naturalization. She now has the same right to an education as the man.

Miss Aiton advises that here in the District, when the night classes began, only men attended; now one-third are women. In addition, she is receiving many inquiries each day from women concerning an education for the purpose of becoming American citizens. In many instances the mother can not leave her home and children and go to school, so Miss Aiton has arranged to take the school to her. The teachers go to the various homes and have group classes at stated places and times. There are now 100 women enrolled in home classes, but there should be a thousand here in Washington alone.

I am particularly proud of the work done in Akron, Ohlo. Fifty-six classes in that one city have been established. Special lessons have been prepared to meet the home interests of the There is probably no city that I know of that can boast of reaching as many foreign-born women with as systematic a program. The value of home classes has been so recognized that however much the general budget for education is reduced the women's classes do not suffer for the benefit of any other phase of the program.

In Pennsylvania the immigrant education work functions under the State department of public instruction. Special attention is given to the education of foreign-born women. It is realized that the mothers can not leave the small children and their many home duties to go to the schoolhouse. known that lessons given in the home are of much more practical value in every way; that the presence of the home teacher at once brings about a higher standard of living.

The plan adopted is to secure mature women who have been public-school teachers, who have married and had a family, and are now free to work again. To such a teacher a course of special training is given on work with foreign-born women. These teachers are then introduced into the homes through the affiliated with the school building in the district in which she teaches and to work under the direction of the principal of the building as all other teachers in the building do. Her time Is divided into short periods, and she is expected to begin at 9 a. m. to give lessons in the home. At first there will be but a single woman in the class, but as the women get acquainted neighbors congregate in fours, sixes, and eights in one house in the neighborhood to take the lesson in the small classes. The teacher spends about one-half hour in each class and goes twice The women are advanced as rapidly as their ability The teaching covers each subject of human interest, the emphasis at first being put upon the speaking, reading, and writing of English and a fundamental knowledge of the Government as a basis for citizenship duties under the enfranchisement of women.

Under this plan Mrs. Sarah R. Christy, regional director immigrant education of Pennsylvania, writes that one home teacher can reach from 30 to 90 women in a week's work. She also states that in a very limited number of towns school boards with broad vision have financed the home teacher, as they do all other teachers. In other cases women's clubs, missionary societies, and other semiprivate agencies become responsible for the teacher's salary. Pittsburgh has one club of foreign women which grew out of Red Cross work. After the war 25 of these women asked Mrs. Christy to meet with them for the purpose of helping them find a legitimate work to do as a group, and she organized them into the Polish Women's Club of Pittsburgh, which now numbers 250.

"My suggestion for further education of foreign-born men and women," says Mrs. Christy, "is that their education in America be made compulsory, laying the obligation both on the foreign born and on the school authorities.'

In Connecticut, Mr. Robert C. Deming, director of the department of Americanization, writes that last year there were 76 classes for women, with more than 500 registered in the daytime, not including evening classes. In his last report, in part, he states:

During the year an attempt has been made to call attention to the problems of the foreign-born women. Students of Americanization throughout the country are thoroughly convinced that we must reach the immigrant mother if we hope to assimilate the foreign born.

INDUSTRIES.

The place of employment offers a good opportunity for the foreign born to learn things American. About 8,000 industries in the United States are cooperating in the education of the foreign born to become citizens. Teachers are employed at the expense of the employer or the board of education to carry on the work.

With reference to work in Massachusetts, Mr. Charles M. Herlihy, state supervisor of adult alien education, writes:

We are quite proud of our factory-class record in Massachusetts—366 asses in 100 different industries, with an enrollment of 5,000 students

These classes are taught by public-school teachers.

AMERICAN LEGION.

The American Legion, under the supervision of Garland W. Powell, national director of Americanization, is endeavoring to promote good citizenship, as well as correcting the evil of illiteracy which is prevalent in our country. The Legion desires to further serve their country in peace time by aiding and assisting not only the educators but all other organizations endeavoring to wipe out illiteracy by creating schools for aliens in order to teach the English language and better understand responsibilities and duties citizenship carries with it.

A night-school movement all over the country has been inaugurated. It seeks to have legislation passed creating schools to accomplish the education of all aliens and illiterates. Legion schools now in existence teach English, civics, and citizenship. The teachers in these schools in many instances are Legion members who have had experience in educational work. It also has adopted the slogan "Adopt an illiterate and teach him to read and write."

DAUGHTERS OF AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

The national society of the Daughters of the American Revolution aid financially and otherwise in educational work carried on in our country. They maintain a teacher at Ellis Island to assist the women and girls who arrive there. Also the local chapters in a great many cases pay the salaries of teachers, whether for night classes or for home work. An interest is taken in all naturalization classes and they seek to assist the courts in impressing the candidates with the dignity of the occasion, presenting him with literature dealing with our country and with our American flag.

BOY SCOUTS.

The Boy Scouts of America are performing a great service by delivering to the various foreign born who have applied for citizenship invitations to enroll in the various night classes. Over a hundred thousand invitations were distributed in one

The foreign-language press also can be an important influence in persuading the immigrant to seek American citizenship. I quote, for example, from the Omalia Bratrasky Vestnik to its

If you want to remain in this country, become Americans; become citizens.

In fact, every patriotic and civic organization, realizing the need of education, is aiding in this work. Colleges, normal schools, and universities in a great many States give a special course for teachers of the foreign born.

Now, why should so much time, effort, as well as money be expended in the education of the foreign born within our country? The answer is found in the fact that illiteracy among aliens is increasing. In 1880 it was 12 per cent; in 1920 it was 13.1 per cent. The answer is found in the census of the population of many of the States. In at least three States 50 per cent of the alien population are unable to speak English.

Again, of the 805,000 immigrants admitted in 1921 more than 264,000 located in New York State and only approximately 180 in the agricultural State of Arkansas. More than 432,000 were of races which, generation after generation, maintain their own customs, languages, schools, and social affiliation almost as intact as if they had remained in their native countries. They form congested communities in large cities that are verita-ble "alien islands." People living in these settlements are People living in these settlements are often wholly out of sympathy with American ideals. In all of our 105,000,000 the foreign stock in the United States consists of one-third that number, the foreign born being 13,920,692, and those of foreign mixed parentage 22,686,204, making a total of 36,606.896. More than half of the foreign born in the United States are located in New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, New Jersey, and Illinois, near manufacturing centers, Take the State of New York. It has a population of 10,385,-000. Of this number 2,825,000 are foreign born. Compare this situation with that vast territory south of the Ohio River and all west of the Mississippi, except North Dakota, Minnesota, Iowa, and Missouri. This territory has a population of 45,-000,000, almost four and one-half times the population of the State of New York, but the foreign born in New York State alone exceed the foreign born in this entire vast territory. According to the census of 1920 only 20.7 per cent of the resldents of the city of New York had fathers and mothers of native parentage.

The present chaotic condition in Europe is partly due to the lack of a common language. In this country we want no language barrier between the people. The problem of the alien which confronts Congress and the country at the present moment is serious. Consider the fact that approximately only 250,000 aliens are enrolled in various classes for the purpose of becoming American citizens. Consider further that there are close to 7,000,000 aliens in the United States. 4 per cent only are seeking to qualify themselves for citizenship. In the 96 per cent are found those who seek to perpetuate their own country here, who make up the little Italy, Spain, Greece, and who seek to perpetuate their own customs, language, and laws, resulting in the breaking down to some extent of the unity of our country. It has been suggested that we should Americanize the aliens before they alienize America. This means the earnest cooperation and support of every loyal citizen. A nation-wide program of education should be carried out. The alien should be given every opportunity of obtaining an education for citizenship purposes, and above all carry the education to the alien wife and mother. Give her the chance here in America that she never had in her own country. Education is the foundation of good citizenship. Give these aliens every opportunity to be educated, to take the oath of allegiance to our country and swear to support our Constitution and flag, and to those who reject our offer, let them return to their native land.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the point of order before I make it, I want to say that it is strange that if this great need exists in the District of Columbia as to this class of work nobody anywhere in official life was able to call it to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations while we were considering this bill, and it has been under consideration for over a month. It seems to me that we are entitled to give consideration to the problems that cost the Treasury money. Nobody anywhere connected with the schools or with any other branch of the Government has called this matter to our attention, but, regardless of whether they did or not, it is subject to the point of order; and I make the point of order.

Mr. CABLE, Mr. Chairman, I am ashamed to say that this Congress has never seen fit to authorize this kind of work carried on and that the point of order, if the gentleman insists upon it, will have to be sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CABLE, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Indiana request unanimous consent to extend and revise their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FOCHT: Page 9, line 14, after the figures "1923," strike out "$15,000" and insert "$50,000."

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, in endeavoring to familiarize myself with this school situation in the District of Columbia, I was amazed to find that only up to the eighth grade are free schoolbooks supplied to the children. The eighth grade is the point at which the books begin to cost something, when it is a burden to the poor man to buy books for his children, in order that they may have a wider and a higher education, which may be obtained in the junior and the senior high schools. That is one of the reasons why we are here to-day trying to get some consideration for the District of Columbia—not in any grand-stand play to the galleries. I am not here to extol the grant of the District because they new have a vote the women of the District because they now have a vote, but I am here to-day to do justice to the children and to do justice to the District, not by trailing behind the Appropriations Committee every year with bills that are subject to a point of order. I am here as the chairman of the committee, with enough intelligence to understand how these bills were not given a fair chance, I want to see the children of the District have free schoolbooks, and I want to see the people here compel their children to go to school, and have compulsory education, the very best that could be had. And I want to say that I think we have not had the consideration that is due the District of Columbia. As chairman of the Committee on the District, I have diligently tried to serve the District of Co-lumbia without asking for anything that is not just.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.
Mr. BLANTON. I want to know if the gentleman could tell us what is the power that is holding back the teachers' salary bill?

Mr. FOCHT. I do not know anything about that. The only thing I know is this: That for week after week, as chairman of the committee, as a member of the majority party-

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. FOCHT. Certainly I am. I am discussing the question of money for the schools here, for schoolbooks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not discussing his amendment. The point is well taken. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. FOCHT. Certainly, I shall be glad to.
Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I want to ask the gentleman a perfectly quiet question apropos of what the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Mondell] said a while ago. He spoke of 13 or 14 bills on the calendar, reported by the gentleman's committee. Is any one of these bills as important as this teachers' bill, which has passed the Senate and is now on the calendar?

Mr. FOCHT. Certainly not; but while others are important you can not do all things first, and when you see half a dozen treated as those bills have been treated, strangled and chloroformed, how are you going to bring the rest of them forward?

Mr. SNELL. I make the point of order that the gentleman must proceed in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for two additional minutes. Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. FOCHT. Now, do not start that with me to-day. This is not the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be permitted to proceed for two additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. How do the salaries of the teachers of the District of Columbia compare with those in other cities? Mr. FOCHT. Yes; that is the point exactly. I wish to say that the salaries here are far below Chicago and Cheyenne and Boston and Philidelphia and New York, and if you had given us the opportunity to-day you would have been appalled and reluctant to have voted against the increase. Anything else? If I can not go on out of order I want, at least, to retain my good humor and I do not want to filibuster. I belong to the crowd that, as far as consistent, goes along with the intelligent directions of the head of the party, but when an attack is made upon the District Committee in this connection, and statements are made that are not in accordance with the facts, I think I should say a few words on behalf of the committee which has served so well and tried to get the business done, but have not been given the opportunity should have as a legislative functioning body, and which I personally should have had from the leadership of this House.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Focht] made a very excellent speech, but he did not say anything in favor of his amendment. He offered an amendment to make this item for textbooks and school supplies $50,000 instead of $15,000. There is no justification for that amendment. Nobody wants it except the gentleman. Nobody wants it, and it is not necessary. Fifteen thousand dollars will buy all the additional books they need between now and the 1st of July, and this bill is proposing to make appropriations for moneys needed between this date and July 1. tleman will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman feel, inasmuch as only half the children of the District of Columbia are furnished with free schoolbooks, when his State and my State give free books, put them in the hands of all the children, does he feel like denying to the poor boys and girls here that which is given them by his State and my State?

Mr. MADDEN. There is no law that authorizes the provision of free books in the District of Columbia, and every dollar we are appropriating is in violation of the law. Now, the gentleman has been chairman of the District Committee for quite a while, and he could have had a bill providing for free schoolbooks.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that both of the gentlemen are out of order.

Mr. FOCHT. I will take a vote on that, please.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the amendment of the gentleman will not prevail.

Mr. FOCHT. I hope it does.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected. The Clerk read as follows:

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY.

Damage claims: To pay claims adjusted and determined by the Department of Commerce under the provisions of the act approved June 5, 1920 (41 Stat. 1854), on account of damage occasioned by acts for which the Coast and Geodetic Survey has been found to be responsible, certified to the present Congress in House Document No. 537, $188.25.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have just returned to the Chamber as the item relating to $500,000 for investigational purposes as to developing rubber plantations had just been read. I am somewhat acquainted with this proposal, and I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee what is hoped to be accomplished by this investigational work that is sought to be covered by this

Mr. MADDEN. It is believed that there is a curtailment of the production of rubber throughout the world with a view of increasing the cost to the ultimate consumer. The United States uses 75 per cent of the world's rubber production, and 80 per cent of that 75 per cent is used by the automobile industry in the United States, indicating that 60 per cent of the world's production is used by automobiles and automobile manafacturers in the United States. It seemed to the Committee on Appropriations to be of vast importance to the United States authorize an investigation of the conditions that would enable the United States to know where a rubber supply could be developed in war time or in time of peace; and in war time, with the present producing territory, the United States is absolutely helpless. We believe that an investigation such as we provide for here will give the information that will lead finally to knowledge of where Americans can invest in the rubber in-There is alarm at these conditions. It is feared that there will be an attempt made to cut the present rubber production down to 60 per cent of its present production, and thereby not only take away the rubber that is so essential to the needs of American manufacturers but also increase the price beyond the power of America to pay; and every 10 cents added to a pound of rubber will add $50,000,000 to the rubber bill of the United States. If it should go up to a dollar, gentlemen can see how many hundreds of millions that will add to the cost of rubber to the American consumer. So we believe. and Mr. Hoover believes, that he can supply information as the result of this appropriation which will not only enable America to protect itself and safeguard its interest as to the matter of rubber used but also as to the matter of nitrates and many other agricultural products essential to the successful conduct of agriculture in America.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chalrman, the Secretary of Commerce has now in his possession, and has had for several months, a brief furnished him by one of the leading tire manufacturers of the country with detailed information of the available rub ber supplies that grow in the East Indies and also in the Philip-Some years back the leading rubber manufacturers of this country attempted to form a large corporation with a capital of some $20,000,000 to develop and raise plantation rubber in the Tropics. Some of the rubber manufacturers have gone ahead along those lines. Rubber can be manufactured only where there is heavy moisture,

Mr. MADDEN. Grown.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; grown, I mean, where there is heavy moisture and where there is intense heat. The British Government has the advantage at present. More than a year ago the British Parliament passed an act creating what is known as the Davenport Commission, whereby it vested in this commission the authority to fix the price on a diminishing output. Just a few years ago there was a surplus of raw rubber, but under the influence of this governmental commission they have restricted the supply so that the price is now mounting. ican capital has gone into the raising of plantation rubber in the Philippines, just as the British Government has gone into the raising of plantation rubber in the East Indies.

I can not now recall offhand the extent of those plantations, but they are productive to a considerable amount. Undoubtedly the Britons have the advantage over us. But I am curious to know what will be done after we get this information. Secretary Hoover has the information at the present time. He has in his possession a brief prepared by some of the leading rubber manufacturers of this country setting forth the total output, setting forth the amount produced in the Philippines and the amount produced by the British in the East Indies. There is no denying the facts stated by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. He has that information.

Mr. STAFFORD. After we get this additional information confirmatory of what he has now, how can we overcome the advantage that the Britons have over us in the raising of raw rubber?

A great many people in the United States who are interested in the use of rubber and are anxious to protect American interests in time of war and in time of peace are ready, I think, to engage in the growth of rubber if they can get facts that justify the investment.

STAFFORD. American capital has gone ahead and invested large amounts in five plantations in Mindanao. tire manufacturers of the country saw the condition confronting them and realized that the British rubber interests had the strangle hold on the American consumer. The British commission came over here within the last two months, a commission to negotiate with the American Importers' Association. What has become of those negotiations I do not know; so far as the press dispatches state, nothing. They have the advantage; they are raising the price, and the price is going to continue to be raised.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it was what was ascertained from the rubber growers of East India that came over here that induced Mr. Hoover to ask for this money. He has been in consultation not only with the rubber growers in East India under British control, but also with the rubber growers in South America as to the extent to which they grow rubber there.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe there is no plantation-grown rubber there. I believe plantation-grown rubber is confined to the East Indies and the Philippines. I am speaking of the plantation rubber as distinguished from the raw naturally grown rubber.

Mr. MADDEN. The industry in the East Indies was the result of taking that rubber tree from Brazil and transplanting it. It has affected the industry in Brazil, and as a result of this development, Mr. Hoover believes, and so do a many manufacturers of rubber in the United States believe, that this is the one central need, to get all the facts and to let these other people know that we are going to get the facts and enter actively into the production of rubber in competition with them.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not see what great value will come from the investigational work other than that we may have a little more thorough investigation than has been made by interested private parties, and that we may inaugurate a policy of granting preferential rights to the growers of rubber in the Philippines somewhat along the lines whereby we grant and receive reciprocal rights with respect to the importation of wood pulp and print paper from Canada.

We realized years back that the Canadians had the advantage over us in having an available supply of wood pulp, and under the lead of that great statesman who has passed from our midst, the late lamented James R. Mann, who was the head of the wood pulp and print paper commission back in 1908, and with whom I had the honor to serve on that commission, we solved the problem growing out of the control that Canada in the future would have of the pulp-wood supply when the industry would eventually go to Canada.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I can not yield.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.
Mr. STAFFORD. The output of print paper within the last decade has doubled in Canada. I suppose that the representations of this commission or committee will be that in order to protect our users of rubber, the tire manufacturers in particular, it will recommend that any country like Great Britain, through its Davenport Commission, seeking to control the price of rubber by raising it as it lessens the supply, will be met with a condition, if they attempt that, where they will have to pay higher and higher rates of duty, and thus be compelled to re-frain from their exactions for the benefit of the American manufacturer.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee. Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think that it is a matter of very great importance, in order that American capital may be interested in establishing rubber plantations in Central America or in southern Mexico or in Latin America generally, that capital shall be furnished with some definite information, not only as to the output to which the gentleman refers, because that is well known, but as to questions of transportation and labor possibilities, and so forth, all of which Mr. Hoover says he will investigate if he is given this appropriation?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; but I take the position that the American tire manufacturers have this information. I am speaking of something I know, because I examined the brief of the large tire manufacturers which was handed to Mr. Hoover. It has the full information.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is an item in the bill of greater importance than this particular provision which seeks to place at the disposal of the Secretary of Commerce $500,000 to investigate the source of crude rubber, and which has been broadened to include the production of nitrate and sisal. As the gentleman from Illinois has said, the rubber industry in this country is entirely under the domination and control of the British interests, operating by reason of the fact that they produce more than 72 operating by reason of the fact that they produce more than 72 per cent of the world's supply. But more than that, they produce more than 72 per cent in British East Indies and they control 85 per cent of the entire acreage of production, and of the world's supply the United States consumes more than 75 per cent. Certainly that is a condition that no one wants to see continued. Something must be done to relieve the rubber industry in this country.

It can only be secured by inducing American capital to go into those countries adapted to growing rubber and making an investment to establish rubber plantations. If the Bureau o Foreign and Domestic Commerce was established for anything— If the Bureau of and it is one of the most important and valuable bureaus of this Government—it was for just such a purpose as this. Secretary Hoover believes that he can secure information and furnish it to the public which will induce American capital to establish rubber plantations.

The Manden Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, it must be understood that the investigation to be made is so extensive that if manufacturers undertook to make it one would make an investigation here and the other there and there would be no coordination and we would not have the information as a complete whole and they could not do it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is correct. This is not a small proposition. To establish a rubber plantation of any size is going to require millions of dollars. Capital will eertainly wish to be informed not only as to the labor, the type of labor, the possibility of getting the land, the amount that will have to be paid for purchase or rent of the land, and the question of transportation.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. In addition to what the gentleman from Tennessee has already stated, is not it important that arrangements be made in many cases with the Government of other countries in order to protect in a sense the American investors which private capital would not under any circumstances be able to make?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; and, of course, capital can not make those arrangements. Therefore it is important to make the appropriation, in order that our country may make whatever arrangements with foreign countries which may be necessarv

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. SISSON. It ought also to be stated that if private capital should go in to get this information private capital would want to keep it for its own use and benefit; but if the Government gets the information accurately it will be for the use, as Mr. Hoover has stated, of everybody. Everyone who has use for it will have access to the information, and there will be no monopoly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This is a very interesting question, and I am asking for information: What is the available territory anywhere contiguous to the United States where rubber plantations might be set up?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Rubber can only be grown in tropical countries. Therefore we are limited to Latin America and to the Philippines.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What about Mexico?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And the southern part of Mexico. I understand that some wild rubber has been obtained from Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the able and distinguished gentleman from the State of Tennessee, my colleague and friend, Mr. Byrns, for the clear and splendid manner in which he handled the nitrate and Muscle Shoals question when he was discussing the proposition before the House the other day. During my last campaign one of the principal questions was whether Congress would vote on the Muscle Shoals proposition or not. I stated then that I feared that we would not be given an opportunity to vote on the question, but that I had cooperated with the Alabama delegation and my colleagues interested in the welfare of farmers, in urging that we be given an opportunity to vote on it. I made the statement because I told them that I appreciated or thought I knew the powerful influences which were opposed to the offer of Henry Ford. I thought that I saw a ray of light when my distinguished colleague from Illinois [Mr. Map-DEN] made his able speech the other day advocating that some action be taken on this question. I now fear my hope was in vain. But, Mr. Chairman, Ford is not a quitter and I predict now that public opinion will force a vote at the next session, and when that time comes there is no doubt in my mind but that the action will be favorable. The farmers are entitled to relief, must have relief, and you are going to be forced to give same to them. forced to give same to them.

Mr. TILSON. Will not my friend from Florida get leave to extend his remarks on these extraneous matters?

Mr. SEARS. This is on nitrates.

Mr. TILSON. No; it is not on nitrates. I hope the gentleman will discuss the matters contained in the bill, Mr. SEARS, I am about through with this. I simply wanted to congratulate my friend from Illinois, as well as my friend and colleague from Tennessee-

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman has done that handsomely and I hope he will now desist.

Mr. SEARS. I am going to desist. He tion of $500,000 to investigate something, Here is an appropria-

I hope some day Congress will get down to doing something toward giving the people relief, instead of investigating. Eight years ago when I came here about the first bill that I had to vote upon was one providing for an investigating committee. Even since then we have been investigating, investigating, and investigating, and about the only thing that we have found out from all of these millions of dollars that we have spent is that corn bread is wholesome, and that you can eat it without dying. I knew that as soon as I knew anything. It reminds me of a coincidence down home. I had an old negro working on my place. One day he came into my office and said, "Mr. Joe, they are about to take my home from me." I said, "Why, Uncle Alf, they can not take your home from you; I will not stand for that. Do not bother me any more, but go and get a surveyor and have him survey it and put down the stakes and you stay there and hold it." He replied, "That is the trouble, Mr. Joe. I got one veyor and he veyed it. The white man got a veyor and he veyed it and he put the line 10 feet in. I went and got another veyor and he veyed it and he put the line 5 feet out. Then the other man went and got a veyor and he veyed it, and he put the line in 15 feet, and I am afraid if they vey it any more I won't have any home left." The trouble here is that we have been investigating and investigating—spending the people's money on investigations of questions that we should know something about, know all about before we begin the investigation, until we have just about bankrupted the Treasury. What the people want is not investigations, but real action; some proposition put into effect which will give the farmers of this country some relief.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I refer now to the paragraph on page 17 of the bill-

Mr. MADDEN. We are now on page 18, but I would be glad to answer a question.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I refer to the paragraph on page 17, lines 7 to 19, inclusive.

Mr. MADDEN. That is the investigation which these gentlemen have been talking about.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is the Department of Commerce.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In the Philippines and Latin America. The proviso appropriates $100,000 additional.

Mr. MADDEN. Not additional, but it comes out of the $500,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It does not say so.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what it means.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It says "such amount as the President may, in his discretion, direct, not exceeding $100,000."
Mr. MADDEN. That shall be available to the department, but out of the $500,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The paragraph provides that the following sums are appropriated.

Mr. MADDEN. We have a number of items under the Department of Commerce, and that is why we used that language. Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But that $100,000 under this language would be appropriated beyond the $500,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Absolutely not.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I suggest that you put in the word "of," and that will make it all right.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 17 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the language is all right as it is.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting after the word "that," in line 19, page 17, the words "of this

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Madden: Page 17, line 19, after the word "that," insert the words "of this sum."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amend-

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, while we are considering the form of the bill, I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Madden] to several instances of a lack of uniformity in the bill. I notice that under the Department of Agriculture the committee uses the phrase "in the city of Washington and elsewhere." When we get over to the Department of Commerce, we find the phrase, which I think is the one generally used, "in the District of Columbia and elsewhere." As I understand it, there is no such governmental entity as the city of Washington, and that the proper language is "in the District of Columbia and elsewhere.

Mr. MADDEN. We have simply followed the phraseology used in the various appropriation bills.

Mr. TILSON. The Committee on Agriculture, when framing the bill, used the phrase "in the city of Washington and elsewhere," whereas the other committees used the other phrase, and this committee has not modified the language.

Mr. MADDEN. We are carrying out the language of the different acts.

Mr. TILSON. I suppose no question would ever be raised in regard to it, but in the interest of uniformity it seems to me that hereafter in the preparation of bills the proper phrase should be used

Mr. MADDEN. I think the gentleman is correct.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 13775. An act to amend the revenue act of 1921 in respect to credits and refunds.

H. R. 13774. An act to amend the revenue act of 1921 in respect to exchanges of property.

THIRD DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the development of a water supply for the Navajo and Hopi Indians on the Navajo, Moqui, Pueblo, Bonito, San Juan, and Western Navajo Reservations, fiscal year 1921, $222.79, reimbursable out of any funds of said Indians now or hereafter available.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, a number of bills have just come over from the Senate which ought to be signed immediately. They can not be signed by the Speaker pro tempore without special authority from the House. I move that the committee do now rise, and I do that in order that we may be able to give that authority to the Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. BLANTON. Is that respecting the 23 bills that were just sent over?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know how many have come. Mr. BLANTON. They were the ones that were passed about one a minute the other day?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know. The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. Campbell of Kansas having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MCARTHUR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 14408, a deficiency appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

APPROVAL OF APPOINTMENT OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution No. 564.

Resolved. That the designation of Hon. PHILIP P. CAMPBELL, a Representative from the State of Kansas, as Speaker pro tempore be approved by the House, and that the President of the United States and the Senate be notified thereof.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14408. The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14408, the deficiency bill, with Mr. McARTHUR in the chair.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

PENSION OFFICE.

Army and Navy pensions, as follows: For invalids, widows, minor children, and dependent relatives, Army nurses, and all other pensioners who are now borne on the rolls, or who may hereafter be placed thereon, under the provisions of any and all acts of Congress, fiscal year 1923, $16,000,000: Provided, That the appropriation aforesaid for Navy pensions shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund, so far as the same shall be sufficient for that purposes: Provided further, That the amount expended under each of the above items shall be accounted for separately.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. Kelley of Michigan having taken the chair, a message in writing from the President of the United States was presented by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following title:

On February 23, 1923:

H. R. 5249. An act for the relief of Ephraim Lederer, collector of internal revenue for the first district of Pennsylvania; and

H. R. 9887. An act for the relief of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co.

On February 26, 1923:

H. R. 3499. An act for the relief of the Atlas Lumber Co., Babcock & Willcox, Johnson, Jackson & Corning Co., and the C. H. Klein Brick Co. ;

H. R. 5475. An act for the relief of the Standard American Dredging Co.;

H. R. 5648. An act for the relief of Ike T. Boyles;

H. R. 13128. An act authorizing an appropriation for the construction of a road within the Fort Apache Indian Reservation,

H. R. 13808. An act granting the consent of Congress to the commissioners of Venango County, their successors and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Allegheny River, in the State of

H. R. 2049. An act for the relief of the Delaware River Lightering Co.

H. R. 9316. An act for the relief of Robert J. Ashe; and

H. R. 13481. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

THIRD DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the chairman of the committee kindly state to the committee the total amount which is now appropriated for pensions, both for the Army and the Navy, and how much is required for compensation under the war risk insurance act?

Mr. MADDEN. Two hundred and fifty-two million dollars for pensions. The appropriations for the Veterans' Bureau for next year are as follows: For compensation, $118,500,000; for hospitalization, $48,700,000; for vocational training, $121,000,000; for insurance, $90,000,000; for administration, $50,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Making a total of how much altogether? Mr. MADDEN. Nearly $700,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the gentleman's estimate of the requirement for increases in these amounts occasioned by the World War as the years go on?

Mr. MADDEN. It looks as if under the present law there would be a less number in the hospitals and there will be a less number in vocational training, and there will probably be a less number drawing compensation after a few years.

Mr. STAFFORD. There will be a great deal drawn on account of insurance?

Mr. MADDEN. It is $90,000,000 for next year in excess of the amount of premiums paid. Potentially the loss on the term insurance is about a billion dollars.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood when the war risk act was under consideration providing for the insurance feature that the premiums prescribed were sufficient to bear the cost of the loss but not the cost of administration.

Mr. MADDEN. There was $23,000,000 appropriated at the time, and that was the only appropriation that has been made up to the beginning of the fiscal year 1924. We appropriated $90,000,000 to pay the losses on the premiums, and this bill carries $13,335,000 to pay the losses on premiums between now and the 1st of July. There will be about $90,000,000 a year.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman estimates in the future it will cost the Government about $90,000,000 to provide for the difference in premiums and losses?

Mr. MADDEN. It will not be less.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman says it will not be less; that means more?

Mr. MADDEN. It may be a little more, but I do not think it will run very high.

Mr. HAWLEY. How high? Mr. MADDEN. The highest The highest it will run for any one year will be about $120,000,000. The total loss will be about a billion dollars on all the term insurance.

Mr. STAFFORD. Until the last person insured expires, the total loss will be a billion dollars?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; 245,000 is the number of risks carried, and the amount is $1,850,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. The loss is independent of the amount we appropriated for vocational, hospitalization, compensation, and so forth?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

PATENT OFFICE.

For the share of the United States in the expense of conducting the international bureau at Berne, Switzerland, fiscal year 1921, $775.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

" RECLAMATION SERVICE.

"For investigations of the feasibility of irrigation by gravity or pumping, water sources, water storage, and related problems on the Columbia River and its tributaries, and for cooperative and miscellaneous investigations of the feasibility of reclamation projects, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; purchase, repair, maintenance, hire, and operation of motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles; and for all other expenses; reimbursable in the case of any project if and when adopted for construction by the United States or other agency; to remain available until December 31, 1924, as follows:

"Columbia Basin project, $100,000; Umatilla Rapids project, $50.000; cooperative and miscellaneous investigations of reclamation projects, $125.000; in all, $275,000."

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve a point of order for an explana-

Mr. MADDEN. Just a short time ago the Congress passed the act of February 21, 1923. It reads like this:

That the following sums are hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available for expenditure by the Secretary of the Interior, namely:

For investigations of the feasibility of irrigation by gravity or pumping, water sources, water storage, and related problems on the Columbia River and its tributaries, including the Columbia Basin project, $100.000; the Umatlila Rapids project, $50,000; in all, $150,000.

For cooperative and miscellaneous investigations of the feasibility of reclamation projects, $125.000 annually.

This act was passed and the estimates submitted. The appropriations are in accordance with the law. So far as I can ascertain, without making a personal investigation, they are important subjects. I called in Mr. Davis, the Director of the Reclamation Service, after the deficiency bill had been reported. I did not have time to bring it before the committee.

Mr. SNELL. Is this a deficiency?

Mr. MADDEN. It is a deficiency to carry out the act. All the regular bills have gone through. It can not be put anywhere except on a deficiency act. The annual bill has been passed and this is a supplemental amount.

Mr. TILSON. It could not be expended until the 1st day of July next anyway?

Mr. MADDEN. No. Mr. Davis says that the importance of this subject is greater than anybody would suppose. There are a number of great problems which the reclamation section of the Interior Department are trying to work out. They can not work them out until they have made surveys in connection with this work, and it is such a vast thing, he says, that it is essential that great care be taken in the surveys. For instance, the Columbia River Basin project—as to this he says if it is ever deemed to be feasible or advisable, it will require an expenditure of over $300,000,000 for irrigation and power. There is a vast amount of power to be developed-several million horsepower, as I understand-and before they can tell what they ought to do about the disposition of power or the licensing of those who wish to build dams to create power they have got to find out what disposition they can make of the waters, through this survey, and he says it is absolutely necessary to make the surveys. The Federal Power Commission is also make the surveys. interested in it.

Mr. STAFFORD. We had up for consideration the need of the development of the Columbia River Basin and also the Umatilla Rapids Basin. Has the committee given any investigation as to the need of appropriating $125,000 for survey purposes, not to be reimbursable but to come out of the Treasury and in addition to the money they now have out of the recla-mation fund? Has the gentleman any information as to how much they have had annually for survey purposes out of the reclamation fund?

Mr. MADDEN. About $100,000. I asked Mr. Davis about this, and he said it was very important that the appropriation should be made. It is all reimbursable, but they have not the funds with which to go on with the work.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not wish to challenge the gentleman's statement about its being reimbursable, but according to my information this $125,000 is not reimbursable. When the bill was under consideration in the House the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Cramton], who gives close attention—

Mr. MADDEN. It is reimbursable under my amendment. I ask that the Clerk read it again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reimbursable if and when adopted for construction purposes.

Mr. MADDEN. It would not be fair to take this $125,000 that is being appropriated for investigational purposes now, much of which will be used to enable the Water Power Commission to grant licenses and get revenue and charge it against existing reclamation projects. It would not be fair to do that, and Mr. Davis so stated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin withdraws

The cuestion is on agreethe reservation of the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.
The Clerk read as follows:

For fees of jurors, fiscal year 1923, $200,000.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Burtness: Page 29, line 16, after the figures "$200,000," change the period to a colon and add the following: "Provided, That the allowance for jurors' fees shall hereafter be $5 per day."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that, or I will reserve it if the gentleman wants to speak on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the amendment I have offered is very plain. I desire, also, to supplement this amendment with an amendment to the next section; that is, to increase the witness fees to $3 a day

I think most of you are aware that witnesses in Federal courts now receive the munificent compensation of $1.50 per day, and that jurors receive $3 per day. I submit to you in all frankness that as we are trying to provide funds with which the Department of Justice can properly enforce the laws of the country, we ought not to leave one of the main vulnerable places as weak as it is left in this very particular. All of you who have tried lawsuits for the Government or local subdivisions know that when you send an officer out with a subpena and force in a witness on behalf of the Government, force him away from his home and business and bring him into court, and he finds that he is to receive a per diem of only $1.50, he is naturally sore; sore at the court, sore at the district attorney, sore at the marshal, sore at everybody connected with the court, and under such conditions the Government does not get a square deal.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman say he is sore because he gets $1.50 a day?

Mr. BLANTON. My experience is-and I have had some Mr. BLANTON. My experience is—and I have had some experience in the matter—that many of these witnesses have friends with whom they stay every time they attend court. But the jurors do not. Let a man get on the jury and the marshal takes the jury out and keeps them at a hotel, or they sometimes sleep in the courthouse—they have sleeping rooms, beds, and bedding usually provided for in the courthouse—and all they have to do is to pay for their meals.

all they have to do is to pay for their meals.

Mr. BURTNESS. I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. BLANTON. I was giving the gentleman some facts.

Mr. BURTNESS. That might be true in some localities in Texas, but I do not think that is true as to the Federal courts in other parts of the country.

Mr. BLANTON. In the gentleman's country I suppose they put up at the Willards and the Raleighs. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURTNESS. I submit that a person who attends the courts of this great Nation ought at least to get as much as is required for living purposes during that time, and likewise those men who sit on the Federal jury.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For making such changes as may be permissible under the terms of the treaty providing for the limitation of naval armament, concluded on February 6, 1922, published in Senate Document No. 126 of the Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, in the turret guns of the battleships Florida, Utah, Arkansas, Wyoming, Pennsylvania, Arizona, Oklahoma, Nevada, New York, Texas, Mississippi, Idaho and New Mexico, as will increase the range of the turret guns of such battleships, to remain available until December 31, 1924, $6,500,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph because it is legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill, and it is new construction unauthorized on an appropriation bill. I also call attention to the fact that it is not only unauthorized legislation on an appropriation bill but it is as well a direct violation of the treaty entered into between this Government and others in what is known as the four-power pact. I want to call attention to the parliamentary situation. In order to attempt to make this legislation in order so this appropriation could be made, the distinguished gentle-man from Pennsylvania [Mr. Butler] brought in what is known as his omnibus legislative bill a week or ten days ago. In that bill was a legislative item carrying this particular matter. It was designed to make this particular matter in order.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think those who are charged with the responsibility of making the appropriation did not have that idea.

Mr. BLANTON. I see they did not have it.
Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The policy of making these changes we felt should come from the Committee on Naval Affairs; not that the Committee on Appropriations did not have the authority to make the appropriation, but before the appropriation was made the policy should be determined by the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Here is the point. I do not want the two committees to go out in the dark and meet each other coming back. If this legislation is in order on this bill the other legislation sought to be enacted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in his omnibus bill was to no purpose and unneeded; it was a reenactment of present authority of lav because if we already had law for this matter, why reenact it?

Now, I want to say that I do not know what the facts are, and I can only learn from rumor, but it has been rumored that since the bill was under discussion, so mysteriously sidetracked and pigeonholed, put to sleep, that there has been word from the great Secretary of State that possibly the contention made on the floor that that provision was in violation of the treaty is correct.

Mr. BUTLER. Will my friend yield?
Mr. BLANTON. I will.
Mr. BUTLER. No; I will say to my friend that the bill has not been sidetracked; it stops by the side of the road, but we expect to start it again within 48 hours.
Mr. BULLER. No; I will say to my friend that the bill has not been sidetracked; it stops by the side of the road, but we expect to start it again within 48 hours.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman does not start it sooner than 48 hours he had better not start it at all.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know where we will land, but we are doing the best we can to have the legislation completed. I am going to ask the gentleman not to make the point of order at this time, not to press it, not to ask the Chair at this time to decide it. That legislative bill may not become

Mr. BLANTON. I hope it will not.
Mr. BUTLER. My friend will appreciate the statement that it is in jeopardy, but this work ought to be done.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not discussing the merits of the

Mr. BUTLER. I hope he will not press his objection here, but will allow this amendment, as I would call it, attached to this bill to go through so that it will become a law at this time. The Naval Affairs Committee unanimously recommended it.

Mr. BLANTON. My friend does not believe that expediency ought to rule the Chairman in making a decision?

Mr. BUTLER. I am going to ask the gentleman not to press his point of order, not to compel the Chairman to decide it, but allow it to pass along.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think expediency will control the Chairman, because he is from Oregon, in the great Northwest, where men come with convictions and have the courage to stand by them.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman from Texas was urging the fact that the Naval Affairs Committee brought in a legislative provision as having some bearing upon the question of this not being authorized by law.

Mr. BLANTON. If it was already authorized, why did they bring it in?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is what I am going to call to the attention of the gentleman, and I think he will see the importance of it. The Committee on Appropriations without doubt has authority to appropriate for the repair or modification of any vessel now in the Navy to any extent,

Mr. BLANTON. But suppose the treaty says otherwise?
Mr. VINSON. It does not say so.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. It does not say otherwise; but leaving that out, under the rules of the House, as I say, the Committee on Appropriations has that authority. This question of assembling ships involves a considerable sum of money, and the Committee on Appropriations thought that the policy of whether the ships ought to be remodeled should be determined by the Committee on Naval Affairs first, and that is why we suggested, as some of us did, to the Navy Department, that they first submit the matter to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs-not that we did not have the authority to do it.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say just a word upon the point of order. This is not a question of expediency. I cite the Chair to the four-power pact, which I send to his desk and ask him to note the following paragraph under the heading of "replace-

No alterations in side armor, in caliber, number, or general type of mounting of main armament shall be permitted—

And so forth.

If the Chair will turn to that heading, he will find that there are two provisions with regard to two other countries not applicable to us

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Texas whether or not it is the opinion of the gentleman in arguing this matter that this four-power treaty is now in effect?

Mr. BLANTON. I submit this, that whenever the Government of the United States through its authorized agents signs an agreement that it intends to carry out, and that agreement is being considered by the other nations of the world, and the United States in that agreement made promises with regard to not changing the present status of the naval armament, it is just as binding upon the Congress as if the treaty has been accepted by all of the parties concerned.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. BLANTON. It is the Chair who is going to decide this

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to get the benefit of all discussion.

Mr. BLANTON. I would rather proceed and argue to the

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. What is the language of the

Mr. BLANTON. That so far as the United States is concerned, the only replacement it is authorized to make is to rebuild ships that have been in use some 20 years.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. But this is not a replacement. Mr. BLANTON. Under the head of replacement it says that the United States Government shall not change the mounting of its guns. That provision is specific in that respect; and what is the raising of turrets but a change in the mounting of the guns? My distinguished colleague from Michigan will admit that the purpose of this raising of the turrets is to change the range of the guns so that they will shoot farther and match other guns of other nations

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman y'eld?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I suggest to the gentleman that the paragraph to which the point of order is directed says that such changes must be made as are permissible under the terms of the treaty

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose this treaty provided that we could not buy from the countries of South America any of their superdreadnoughts, and that then Congress attempted to enact provision authorizing us to buy superdreadnoughts of the South American countries, but at the same time inserted a provision that we should do it in accordance with the terms of the treaty. It would be just about as ridiculous as this provi-sion is in this bill. We are violating the terms of the treaty in one part of the paragraph, and in another breath we say that we do not intend to do what we are trying to do. It was admitted on the floor that the intention of this change, that the sole purpose of the expenditure of the $6,500,000 was to make our guns match those of our possible adversaries, and it is violation of the treaty. I submit to the Chair that no question of expediency, however urgent or necessary it is to the interests of this country, should ever cause the United States Government to violate its solemn agreement.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I know we all want to live up to the spirit as well as to the substance of that great treaty formulated by the Washington Conference on Limitation of Armament. In my judgment, this provision of the bill does not violate either the spirit or the letter of that treaty. It is especially provided in that covenant, which, by the way has not yet been signed by France and therefore is not actually in operation, that certain alterations can be made in existing floating tonnage. These alterations must not change the side the caliber, the number of guns, or general type of the mounting of the main armament. All that is proposed here is the reconstruction of these ships, as Great Britain is doing now with her fleet, as she was doing at the time of the conference, and as Japan is doing; all within the purview of the agreements. We submitted this question to the Secretary of the Navy, an executive officer who undoubtedly is in touch with the State Department authorities, as to whether or not any provisions of the treaty would be violated by these alterations, and in his judgment these alterations were not a violation of the treaty. Even though the treaties were not technically in operation because of nonreligation on the provisions. nically in operation because of nonratification on the part of any one of the powers, I would still be insistent in fulfilling the compact for the moral, if not the legal, obligation.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman is addressing himself to the point of order, as I understand it?

Mr. HICKS. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does it make any difference, so far as the point of order is concerned, whether this is violative of the treaty or not? Is that a question for the House?

Mr. HICKS. It is a question of fact. As the gentleman says—and that is not a parliamentary question—whether the treaty is being violated is not a question for the Chair to decide. The parliamentary situation is, Has the Appropriations Committee authority to make this appropriation? In the act of 1907, amended by the act of 1916, the law provides that when changes are made in battleships exceeding $300,000 in amount per ship the Congress will have to make an appropriation to take care of the alterations. Below that amount the Department can make the changes from current funds. provided by law that Congress by appropriating the money can give to the Secretary of the Navy the right to make changes in any of these ships over $300,000 in extent. No new authority is necessary. The authorization is a continuing one, and the funds are dependent upon the voting of the supply. These ships are now in commission, they have been built under legal authorization, and this sum is to make changes. It is not for new ship construction. I doubt if anyone would question the right of Congress to provide funds for placing a new mast or a new deckhouse on a ship without getting any additional legislative authority. This provision merely makes changes of a similar nature.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. I will.
Mr. OLIVER. The position taken by the gentleman from Texas would, under different circumstances, be correct; but in view of the language of the provision in question the gentleman's position is unsound, for the reason that by express language this provision assumes that the treaty is in force and will continue in force, and that nothing herein shall be construed as in any way violating the treaty. The position of the gentleman is that we can repeal a treaty, but since the treaty has been ratified by this Government, and since this provision recognizes the treaty to be now in force, expressly disavowing any intention to violate the terms of the treaty, I submit that the question whether this provision is in contravention of the treaty is germane to the point of order. I do not wish to be understood as arguing that the provision is contrary to the treaty, but I do insist that the question as to whether it is should be considered by the Chair in passing on the point of

Mr. HICKS, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, the limitation placed by Congress upon the amount of money which the Navy Department can expend upon battleship reconstruction is a limitation on the department and not a limitation on the Congress. Congress can appropriate any amount of money for the continuation of a public work authorized and in progress, and that is all we are doing here. We are continuing the construction of a great public work, and we can appropriate any sum choose without legislation, for the authority once given and the work started continues indefinitely. Under the many precedents, universally sustained, making in order appropriations for authorized public work in progress, I hold the point of order should be overruled.

All of these battleships enumerated in this paragraph were authorized by law. If you can not raise the turret of a battleship, you can not put a patch on the boiler of a battleship without specific legislative authority. That is perfectly clear and self-evident. The other point, that it is violative of the treaty, raises a question of fact with which the Chair has no concern. Under the express language of the paragraph the money can not be expended to violate the treaty. is not there for the purpose of passing upon a question of fact. It is sufficient if the appropriation is authorized under the language used. As a matter of fact it does not violate the treaty; it is clearly within the treaty. There is only one possible provision of the treaty which could be connected up with it, and that is the provision of the treaty which says you can not This does not change the character of your gun mounting. change the character of any gun mounting but is simply a question of the elevation of the turrets.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The words in the treaty, as I recall them, are that the general shape of gun mounting, and so forth.

Mr. HUSTED. This does not change any shape of gun mounting; it simply provides for the elevation, and a point of order will not lie against it.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, just a word. It is a simple point of order. It is a well-settled rule that an appropriation can be made for the continuing of a public work. Specifying that an appropriation can be used even for the construction of new vessels as the continuation of a public work-

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no; that is clearly out of order. Mr. TH.SON. Let me finish the statement and read from the Manual.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not agree, I do not care what the gentleman reads. It has always been that you can not. Mr. TILSON. I read from the Manual:

By a broad construction of the rule an appropriation for a new and not otherwise authorized vessel of the Navy is held to be for continuance of a public work.

The CHAIRMAN. Read it again; the Chair did not hear it. Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, the rule of the House itself provides that the Committee on Naval Affairs shall originate these new ships, notwithstanding what the gentleman read Read the rules that passed over three years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will read it again. Mr. TILSON. I was attempting, Mr. Chairman, to bring the matter up to date, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. BUTLER. I am doing that, and if the gentleman will kindly read-

Mr. TILSON. It is a well-established rule of this House that Congress can appropriate for the continuation of a public work. It has been held by a broad construction, as I have read, that Congress can appropriate for a new vessel not authorized by law, and I was simply trying to read what the precedents show with reference to that statement. The later changes in the rules, referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, do not change this particular case, because it is not for the construction of a new vessel. It is for putting something upon a vessel that now exists that has been authorized by law. If it is authorized by law, then the only other point that can be made is that it is in violation of the treaty, for a treaty when duly ratified is the law of the land. That, however, is not possible under this paragraph, because it is specified in the paragraph itself that this appropriation is to be expended "for making such changes as may be permissible under the terms of the treaty," which eliminates all possibility of violating the treaty. Therefore it seems to me that under the well-established rules of the House this paragraph is in order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TILSON, Yes. Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman from Connecticut is usually very clear in his deduction on these rules. I doubt very much whether he is on sound ground when he says that the matter of ordnance or mechanism of a ship is a continuing of an existing public work. Now, by parity of reasoning a bill brought in increasing the number and amount of ordnance in the United States would be a continuation of a public work.

Mr. TILSON. That is not a parallel case.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Another thing, in what case is this a deficiency?

Mr. MADDEN. This does not contemplate an improvement of the machinery or an enlargement of the guns.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct the attention Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, of course this point of order of the Chair to two propositions that have been laid down by is not worthy of serious consideration or extended discussion.

One of them is that the Chair is not called upon, in considering a point of order, to pass upon a question of fact. That is all he is called upon to do, more frequently than anything else. That fact is this: Does the proposed legislation fall because it is not authorized by existing law? If it is contrary to existing law, it is not authorized by existing law. So that it is a question of fact whether or not it is authorized. If it is inhibited by existing law, of course it is not authorized.

Another point I wish to direct the attention of the Chair to is this: It is an ingenious argument that has been suggested, that Congress may get around a point of order and violate a law by making a stump speech in the beginning of what it attempts to do. Taking up this broad proposition, let us assume that it has merit. It does say in the beginning of this paragraph, "If permissible under the terms of the treaty providing for naval disarmament." In other words the amendment says, "We want to do certain things as far as we can without violating that treaty, which is the supreme law of the land." far as the United States is concerned, it is the law of the land at this moment. Suppose, instead of changing these turrets, making a change which is proper, I think, in view of what England is doing-

Mr. MADDEN. It does not change the turrets.
Mr. WINGO. Suppose it provided for the completion of the battleships that were ordered to be scrapped.

Mr. MADDEN. That would be a violation of the treaty.
Mr. WINGO. Suppose it provided that. Would that language in lines 21 and 22 keep it in order simply because at the beginning you made a stump speech protesting that the act you were going to commit, although criminal, is not intended to be a criminal act?

That is a specious argument with gentlemen who try to avoid the real issue. Aside from what the question of intent is, the real point is a question of fact. Does the thing that the act requires violate the law? If the Chair is going to base his decision on anything, I want him to base it on another expression or another fact than that suggested-that because the committee says, "We do not intend to violate the law or the treaty," they may violate it and do violate it. That would get the Chair into trouble if he undertook to base his decision on If the Chair thinks that the change proposed does not violate the treaty, then it would be perfectly in order. This is an expert question.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman think that if we

Does the gentleman think that if we proceeded to provide for something that was not prohibited by the treaty the executive department would be justified under this paragraph to go on and violate the treaty, and hold that we say they can do only such things as are permissible under the treaty?

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is thinking of what the Executive would be justified in doing. I think the Executive would be justified in taking the conclusion of Congress on a question that is within the jurisdiction of Congress. If it were a close question of fact, I think it would be the duty of the Executive department to say, "This is a disputed question; this is a question that is doubtful; but the legislative body, which is familiar with all the facts, which may repeal the treaty if it wants to, has said that this work may be done; that in its judgment it is not a violation of the treaty." There is a twilight zone there, where it is doubtful if you live up to the spirit and letter of the law. I am not a naval expert.

There are two things I wanted to call attention to. that it is a question for the Chair to decide, and the other is that the language as used in the amendment does not alter that

Mr. BLANTON. If there is any doubt in the matter, does not the gentleman from Arkansas think we ought to resolve the doubt in favor of the treaty?

Mr. WINGO. No; if there is doubt I would say we should resolve it in favor of the Navy of the United States [applause], because I think England is doing the very same thing. is a violation of the treaty, and if England is doing this, she can not complain that we are doing the same thing that she is doing; and I understand Japan is doing the same thing. [Ap-

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Arkansas that if this in any way violated the treaty we ought not to put it in the bill. But there can be no question, in my judgment, upon the facts surrounding the case. The treaty provides that there shall be no modification in the general type of the mountings of the guns. The proof that those who drafted the treaty did not have this sort of thing in mind at the very moment that the treaty was being negotiated is found in the fact that the other nations which are parties to the treaty had already increased the range of their guns in this same way at that time and, we are informed, have been doing it since. So that would have an important bearing, it seems to me, upon what those who negotiated the treaty had in mind.

Now as to the other question, whether the Committee on Appropriations might properly report this appropriation, there is a provision of law to the effect that the Secretary of the Navy can not expend more than $300,000 in the repair of a ship in any one year without a special appropriation by Congress. has funds aggregating in the neighborhood of $50,000,000 at his disposal for the repair of vessels-$20,000,000 in the Bureau of Construction and Repair, $20,000,000 in the Bureau of Engineering, and about $10,000,000 in the Bureau of Ordnance, making about $50,000,000 altogether. Out of these funds he can not spend more than $300,000 on any one ship. To spend more than that Congress must make a specific appropriation, and that is what is proposed here—to make a specific appropriation for the repair of vessels already in the Navy. appropriate for an expenditure of $1,000,000, if we should see fit, upon any ship in the Navy without violating the rules.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt that Congress wishes to observe the spirit and the letter of the treaty that was negotiated at the Washington conference a little more than a year ago. We have refrained from construction of battleships; we have observed the very letter as well as the spirit of the treaty, and we shall continue to do so, not because the treaty is the law of the land but because we hope and expect that it will yet become so.

A point of order is a technical matter, and must be answered in the spirit in which it is made. We are not now subject to the terms of that treaty, for it has not become law. A treaty does not go into effect until ratifications of the various parties to the treaty have been exchanged and the President puts it into effect by proclamation. We speak of the ratification of the treaty by the Senate. That is not technically correct. The Senate does not ratify a treaty. The Senate consenthe ratification and advises the President to ratify it. The Senate consents to ratification is purely an executive act by the President.

Great Britain, Japan, and the United States have ratified in the popular sense, but the ratifications have not been exchanged.

France has not considered it yet by the authority that advises ratification, and it is not probable that the treaty will become actual law anywhere until ratifications by all the parties have been exchanged. Nevertheless we, very properly, have been acting as if it were the law of the land. We have been acting in the utmost good faith because we do expect it will be the law of the land, and we are not doing anything to make its acceptance more difficult for any of the governments concerned.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. We have not been doing it as a legal obligation but as a moral obligation.

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes; we expect the treaty will become a law of the land and we do not want to do anything to violate the spirit of it in the meantime.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. TEMPLE. I will.

BLANTON. Suppose by reason of the fact that the treaty has not been ratified, Congress should start a new program of spending $500,000,000 this year, does the gentleman think that France would ever consider ratification at all?

Mr. TEMPLE. That would be a good argument against the passage of the law; it would be a good argument against the policy, wisdom, and morality of such an act by this Congress, but of no force whatever toward sustaining a point of order, because the treaty has never gone into effect.

Mr. MacLAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, in support of the statement that has just been made that the treaty is not in effect, I think more than one Member of this House has noticed in the last few days that the Secretary of the Navy has instructed that the work of the destruction of certain ships, which was contemplated by the treaty, be stopped. It seems to me that that proves absolutely that the treaty is not yet considered to be in force. Furthermore, as my colleague has just stated, we know that the treaty is not in force and I am going to express the hope, Mr. Chairman, that there is not a Member of this House that will try to put any technicalities in the way of the consideration of this part of the bill against which objection has been made. For if it is prevented it means that many of our battleships going into action must pass through 11,000 yards of enemy gunfire before one of our guns can register; and the boys on those battleships will be from Texas as well as from California.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think gentlemen who are anticipating that we may violate the treaty can rest assured that that is not the case, because by the very terms of this paragraph we say that we will not do it and not attempt to do it. But, Mr. Chairman, let me call your attention to the fact that the question whether or not it is a violation of the treaty is not a question for the Chair to decide. The only question for the Chair is, Is there any law for making the appropriations? The whole question as I see it, Mr. Chairman, was well stated by the gentleman from Michigan, and some others as well, and it lies in this particular fact. This is not the construction of a ship. It must be considered as a change in the existing condition of the ship for some particular purpose. That being true, what is the authority? More than $300,000 can not be expended for such purpose except by a specific appropriation for a particular purpose stated by Congress. That is what is now being done. What could you ask further than that Congress should state specifically the purpose for which the appropriation is being made? Affirmatively the law might be stated that Congress may make additional appropriations over $300,000 for a definitely stated specific purpose. It seems to me that answers all objections that can be made.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. TOWNER. Υes.

Mr. BLANTON. In line with what my friend from California said, that we have given up all hopes of the treaty being

Mr. MacLAFFERTY. The gentleman is mistaken, I did

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I call attention to the very next paragraph, where we begin scrapping ships and provide $20,000,000.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman desires to what I think about it, even if the treaty at this time should not be ratified by France, I would be in favor of the United States carrying out to the letter its contract with regard to the scrapping of ships and limiting construction, because I know that eventually the treaty will be ratified.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, for God's sake, let us save this $6,- 500,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. Reference has been made in this discussion to the treaty negotiated at the Conference on the Limitation of Armament held in Washington during the winter of 1921-22, and while the treaty is not the all-prevailing consideration in the determination of the point of order made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton]. it must be said that there is and ought to be a moral obligation upon the part of the Government to conform to the spirit of the treaty, even though it has not been ratified by all of the parties signatory thereto. Irrespective of this, the paragraph in question contains the words:

For making such changes as may be permissible under the terms of the treaty.

In view of this language, the Chair thinks the question raised relative to the treaty can very effectively be disposed of without any further consideration, because it is not possible to put the money to any purpose other than a purpose that comes within the purview of the treaty.

The proposition relative to the guns on these ships in question is one of the general type of mounting and not of the range, according to the provisions of the treaty, and so the Chair is of opinion that that feature of the point of order is not worthy of further consideration.

The provision relative to the status of these ships that are specifically enumerated at the bottom of page 32 and at the top of page 33 is, however, to be determined by the Chair's ruling. It is quite apparent, in view of a well-established line of decisions and precedents, that alterations and repairs may be made to battleships and other naval craft when they come within the purview of the rule authorizing Congress, through the Appropriations Committee, without specific additional legislative authority, to provide for funds for the continuation of a public work in progress. In the Fifty-ninth Congress a naval appropriation bill provided as follows:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy shall hereafter report to Congress at the commencement of each regular session the number of vessels and their names upon which any repairs or changes are proposed, and which in any case amount to more than $200,000.

This sum was subsequently changed to $300,000 by another naval appropriation bill, but there is nothing in this language that compels the Secretary of the Navy to seek additional specific legislative authority for this situation. He must merely report to Congress, so that Congress may consider the amounts.

Irrespective of that, the Secretary of the Navy, in view of a subsequent law, a recent law, does not make his report to Congress but makes it to the Bureau of the Budget, which in turn reports to Congress. This item has been submitted to Congress in the manner provided by law. It is quite clear to the Chair that all of this money proposed here in line 4 of page 33 is for the continuation of an existing public work, and therefore comes within the purview of the rule. The point of order raised by the gentleman from Texas is overruled.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SEARS. As I understand the ruling of the Chair, under the treaty we scrap modern ships and those in course of construction, but we are trying to make modern ships out of-

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.
Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk,

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Dallinger: Page 33, line 4, after the figures "$6,500,000," strike out the period and add the following: "Provided, That no part of the moneys appropriated in this paragraph shall be used or expended for making such changes in private establishments or for the purchase or acquirement of any article or articles that at the time of the proposed changes, purchase, or acquirement can be made, manufactured, or produced in each or any of the Government navy yards of the United States, if time and facilities permit, for a sum less than they can be made, purchased, or acquired otherwise."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order. Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, this is a limitation that has been repeatedly held in order on appropriation bills. It is on the naval appropriation bill that became a law this year, which came from the gentleman's committee, and was offered the other day in the Committee of the Whole House when the naval omnibus bill was considered and adopted by the com-It was ruled by the chairman to be in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is clearly legislation on an appropriation bill, unauthorized by law; that it takes away from the executive that discretion which is authorized to be used by every executive in the performance of his duties. It is not a limitation that effects economy, but, on the contrary, it may cost a great deal of money. I understand, as a matter of fact on the question of economy, the question of bringing it within the Holman rule, that on one order which the Government was required to place in our own arsenals, and in another instance in our navy yards, the Government lost quite a large sum of money.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, in line with the contention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton], I wish to say that there is a long line of precedents which hold that wherever there is a provision in a bill which compels an executive officer to do certain duties, which he is not compelled to do by law previously passed, it is subject to a point of order on the ground of legisla-tion on an appropriation bill. I claim that under this amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dal-LINGER], while I may be in sympathy with its purpose, it provides that to ascertain these things the Secretary of the Navy He must base his action on knowledge must do certain things. obtained, and this requires action and the imposition of new functions and new duties. Therefore, as it imposes upon him certain duties that the law does not now impose upon him, according to precedents I think the Chair will have to sustain the point of order.

W. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL, M. Mr. HICKS. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not the amendment limit the matter to the question of the expenditure of the money for repairs under this appropriation?

Mr. HICKS. No; I think that the gentleman will find that the Secretary of the Navy or some competent authority will have to ascertain certain facts in regard to the expense of materials in one place or in another place, and that is an imposition of new duties, new activities. It is not a limitation on the funds themselves; it goes to executive functions and is therefore obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. DOWELL. That is a question for the Secretary to determine; that is a question of fact. If the fact is to be ascertained-

Mr. HICKS. Who is to ascertain the fact?

Mr. DOWELL. It does not make any difference. As a matter of fact, it is a limitation upon an expenditure, and it is in

Mr. BLANTON. Is this the Hull amendment? The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. This is clearly a limitation as to an executive discretion and not a limitation as to an expenditure in the interest of economy. It does not come within the purview of the rule, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. DALLINGER. Do I understand the Chair holds when it says it must be done outside when it can be done cheaper than in a navy yard-

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled on the matter.

Mr. BUTLER. I have an amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Green]. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Butler: Page 33, after line 4, insert "the limit of cost of the vessels heretofore authorized and hereinbelow enumerated are increased as follows: Battleship Colorado, from $17,000,000 to $17,000,000; scout cruisers Nos. 9 and 10, from $8,250,000 to $8,400,000; destroyer tender No. 3, from $3,400,000 to $4,500,000."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order it is legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill, and it is new construction-

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman will give me a chance— Mr. BLANTON. I will in just a moment, and I will reserve it—and that it is also for new construction unauthorized on an appropriation bill. Now I reserve the point of order so that the gentleman may speak.

Mr. BUTLER. I am going to ask the gentleman to withdraw the point. He is entirely right, it is subject to the point of order. It is the same provision we passed the other day, and it is in accordance with the statement I made to my friend a bit ago.

Mr. BLANTON. I am thinking about the people down home. Mr. VINSON. If the gentleman is thinking about the people down home, he will withdraw it.

Mr. HICKS. Why not think about the Nation a little bit?
Mr. BLANTON. I got an expression from them last summer.
Mr. BUTLER. There is no doubt it is violative of the rules of the House; the gentleman is entirely right.

Mr. BLANTON. If it was for the gentleman personally, I would withdraw it; but I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I just wish to say a word in reference to this $6,500,000 appropriation. It may be justified and may not be. never received very definite information about it. Admiral Mc-Vay and Assistant Secretary Roosevelt told the committee they would furnish some further information as to what changes had been made on the English ships. That information was not I have examined the British estimates for the current fiscal year and I have been unable to find any appropriation carried in them for the purpose of increasing the range of the guns. Of course, that does not positively show that some of those items do not cover this particular work, because the British estimate is not carried out with the definiteness that our estimates are. But I want to say this to the House, that I shall await with considerable interest operations under this particular expenditure of $6,500,000. We will have five ships with guns having the extreme range or elevation when the two that are to be completed this summer have been finished. It is proposed to raise the range of the guns of the other ships from about 21,000 or 22,000 yards to 32,000 yards. ever was hit at a distance above 20,000 yards in a naval battle. The battle off the west coast of South America was fought under ranges of from 8,000 to 15,000 yards, and of course no big guns were engaged. The battle off the Falkland Islands had a range of from 8,000 to 15,000 yards, and the records do not show there were any hits made at the extreme range. The Battle of Jutland was at a range of from 8,000 to 19,000 yards; most of it at a range of from 8,000 to 14,000 yards. A naval statistician has made computations in reference to the number of hits registered, and they found that the big guns made a hit about once in three hours.

Mr. MacLAFFERTY. That is enough.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But it was at ranges of from 8,000 to 14,000 most of the time. The main battle was fought at about Now, the elevation of the guns will have to be greatly changed. Just what is the elevation of the guns on our older ships I do not know. Our later ships have an elevation of, I think, 30 degrees, and the later British ships must have an elevation about the same, and a range of probably 32,000 yards, but when you shoot at such extreme ranges and the object is unseen it greatly diminishes the chance for hitting anything. It is very difficult to hit anything because of the high angle which the shell takes in falling. I want to say that even in battle practice, and in battle practice they are much more apt to hit than in actual battle. I have doubt of their being able to hit a moving target at 32,000 yards. That is 18 miles, and beyond the range of vision from the ship doing the firing. Of course, gentlemen say, or rather the naval experts say, that they will use airplanes to locate the enemy and spotting the shots as they strike the water. In this way they claim they will be able to make hits. I doubt it very much. On the other hand, I will admit that if one of these big shells fired at a high angle should strike the deck of an enemy's ship it would practically put it out of commission.

There seems to be a singular lack of information in the hearings about what they expected to do. The Naval Committee was not told what the elevation of most of the guns is now on the British ships. It was stated that the elevation of the guns on some of our ships was only 15 degrees. I think that is true with respect to some of them.

Mr. HICKS. The elevation on most of the British ships is 33. Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think not. They are listed as 30 degrees on the later ships.

Mr. HICKS. I thought the gentleman said the Naval Committee did not know.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not know how it can when they claim that alterations are being made on them. The later British ships may be provided with 33 degrees elevation, but there is nothing in the hearings about that.

Mr. HICKS. We had a great deal of confidential information before our committee in our hearings which we did not publish.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Supplementing what the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hicks] has said, if the gentleman from Iowa will go to the Navy Department and make inquiry as to the effective ranges, he will find that the information he has given to the House, that 18,000 yards or 19,000 yards is the maximum range, is entirely erroneous.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not state that.

Mr. OLIVER. That is the inference to be drawn from what the gentleman said. He will find that if this is done it will prove very effective.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What I said was that no hits had ever been made in battle at ranges between 22,000 and 32,000 yards. The gentleman should not think that I have not investigated this matter. The fact is I have investigated it very carefully, and as a result I doubt the wisdom of spending money on the old ships for this purpose.

Mr. MacLAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes. Mr. MacLAFFERTY. We hear continually about the British ships. Have you heard anything about the Japanese ships? Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; but only a few of them have got big guns, and only one of them is of recent construction.

Now, just a few words with reference to our Navy in com-parison with the British. We have 10 ships larger than any the British have, with one exception, and that is the Hood, a 41,200-ton ship. Our ships, fewer in number than the British ships, will have a heavier broadside and carry heavier armor, even including the British ships that can not be finished until We are in no danger from the British Navy, even it some one was guilty of such criminal folly or insanity, whichever you may term it, of committing an act which brought on war between England and the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Scrapping of naval vessels: The Secretary of the Navy may use, pursuant to the provisions of the act approved July 1, 1922, entitled "An act authorizing the President to scrap certain vessels in conformity with the provisions of the treaty limiting naval armament, and for other purposes," the unexpended balance on the date of approval of this act under the appropriation heretofore made on account of scrapping of naval vessels, together with the sum of $12,500,000, which is hereby appropriated, for necessary expenses in connection with the care and preservation of vessels whose construction has been or shall be suspended or discontinued on account of the treaty limiting naval armament, and for expenses of handling, preserving, and inventorying material on hand or in course of fabrication for said vessels, and toward payment of bills for material already completed for said vessels and toward payment of any amounts payable as a result of the modification or cancellation of contracts and purchase orders on account of said vessels, their machinery, materials, and equipment, and for reimbursement to contractors of carrying charges heretofore or hereinafter approved by the Secretary of the Navy, to cover additional expenses resulting from the deferring of deliveries or payments under said contracts and purchase orders, and for reimbursement to contractors for work done and for such portion of running and overhead expenses and other indirect charges as may be approved by the Secretary of the Navy on account of contracts under which settlement is deferred on account of the treaty limiting naval armament, and a further sum of $8,450,000 is hereby appropriated for the payment of any amounts payable as a result of the modification or cancellation of contracts and orders, including incidental expenses, for the armament, armor, ammunition, and ordnance outfits (including material required in connection therewith) of vessels whose construction has been or shall be suspended or discontinued on account of the treaty limiting naval armament, and for settlement of contracts and orders for material for destroyer-type torpedoes in excess of requirements for the number of such torpedoes that may be completed under the provisions of the naval appropriation act approved July 1, 1922; in all, $20,950,000, to remain available until June 30, 1924.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, line 17, after the comma and the word "preserving," insert "transporting"; and on page 33, line 24, in lieu of the word "hereinafter," insert "hereafter."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest also, in line 14, of page 34, the word "on" should be changed to the word 'or." Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to include that in his amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered and modified

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving a point of order, I wish first to inquire of the chairman of the committee how much of this total fund is going to be paid to the contracting shipbuilding concerns for reimbursement by reason of carrying charges?

Mr. MADDEN.

Mr. MADDEN. None for carrying charges. Mr. STAFFORD. You have an item here at the bottom of page 33 "for reimbursement to contractors of carrying charges heretofore or hereinafter approved by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me explain it in this way: The work of constructing the ships was discontinued on August 1 last. Since that time no work has been done on the ships. All the overhead charges have been discontinued, and about $1,250,000 overhead charges have been saved as a result of stopping work at that time. About $2,500,000, as I recall, will be saved as the result of the action taken in stopping the work on August Overhead charges, of course, there are, because the ships are on the docks. These docks belong to the private owners. The ships are occupying the space. We must pay rent for the space or take the ships out, and we must pay more or less of the total charge of the construction on account of the space these ships occupy.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman information about the total charges against the Government by reason of the deferring of the work

Mr. MADDEN. Three million one hundred thousand dollars will be charged for overhead out of this appropriation; $8,450,-000 of this appropriation is to be paid for work already done on ordnance contracts. That includes all finished material for ordnance and all partially finished material; but no charge is included in the $8,450,000 for prospective profits. This settles everything in connection with ordnance.

Now, there has been no settlement made on hulls and ma-chinery, and no settlement will be made for the time being, until we know whether France will ratify the treaty or not. What has been done is to stop the expense. The hull and machinery contracts still exist, in connection with which we are paying for the rent of the yards and such overhead as I have described.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are we to understand that the t claimed by reason of the deferred work will be $3,100,000?

Mr. MADDEN. That is for overhead; nobody knows when they will cancel the contracts for hulls and machinery. If the contracts are not canceled we will be in a position to go ahead without the expenditure of any money for preliminary work, and we will have saved by the conservation of their contracts the difference between the amount we are paying now and the value of the contract, including the overhead which we would have to pay under conditions which now prevail.

Mr. STAFFORD. The $3,100,000 of adjudicated claims have been settled through the Navy Department adjuster?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the further claims—
Mr. MADDEN. The further claims—we do not know how much they will be, because we do not know how soon we will have to scrap the ships or proceed with their construction.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. MADDEN. Yes.
Mr. OLIVER. Can the gentleman estimate the approximate loss sustained by the Government by reason of the delay in ratification?

Mr. MADDEN. No. That is pretty hard to tell. In fact, no one can tell

Mr. OLIVER. But there is a loss, and it may continue. Mr. STAFFORD. It may amount to more than $10,000,000 and possibly to $20,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. It depends upon the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For temporary and auxiliary clerk hire and for substitute clerk hire for clerks and employees absent with pay at first and second class post offices, and temporary and auxiliary clerk hire at summer and winter resort post offices, fiscal year 1923, $1,250,000.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to make a statement and ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. I notice this paragraph appropriates one million and a quarter dollars for the auxiliary force of the postmasters. I have received information to the effect that in my own home city of Fort Worth, Tex., the postal receipts for January, 1923, were 58 per cent in excess of the receipts for the corresponding month in 1922. And thus far in February the increase has been even greater. In spite of this very re-markable increase in receipts a reduction of 35 men has been authorized in the force. I understand that these men come from the auxiliary force provided for in this paragraph. I would like to make the inquiry of the chairman of the committee if a million and a quarter dollars, as provided here, represents the full amount requested by the department and authorized by the Bureau of the Budget?

Mr. MADDEN. It does. They have everything they need.

Mr. LANHAM. The gentleman thinks that this will be adequate?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. We did not want to take any chances in crippling such sections as the gentleman represents.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Railway Mail Service: For 15 division superintendents, 15 assistant division superintendents, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the Post Office Department appropriation act for the fiscal year 1923, $1,000,000.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois the necessity for this appropriation, a million dollars for Railway Mail Service.

Mr. MADDEN. The situation in respect to that is this: The appropriation made for 1923 was inadequate in the first instance. The Second Assistant Postmaster General tried in every way to keep within the amount of the appropriations. There were 305 less clerks on the active roll than there were at the beginning of the fiscal year.

This is for the division superintendent and the Mr. ROUSE assistant division superintendent; it does not provide for the salary of clerks.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; it does. This is the language of the act, but we are eliminating some language so as not to take up too much space. There were 305 less clerks in January than there were at the beginning at the fiscal year. The railroad strike put every train behind for months, and some men would have as much as five or six hours' overtime, and all men on all trains on the principal roads had overtime, and the testimony before us showed that the cost of the department as the result of the strike for overtime was about $1,500,000. gave them $1,000,000 to try to make up; they said they did not have the money to pay during the month of June.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma

amendment

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to again offer the amendment and have it inserted at the proper

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to offer an amendment and have it inserted at the proper place. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Let it first be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Butler: Page 33, after line 4. insert: "The limits of cost of the vessels heretofore authorized and herein below enumerated are increased, as follows: Battleship Colorado, from $17,000,000 to $17,600,000; scout cruisers Nos. 9 and 19, from $8,250,000 to $8,400,000 each; and destroyer tender No. 3, from $3,400,000 to $4,500,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,

Vehicle service: For additional amount required for vehicle allowance, the hiring of drivers, the rental of vehicles, and the purchase and exchange and maintenance, including stable and garage facilities, of wagons or automobiles for, and the operation of, screen-wagon and city delivery and collection services, fiscal year 1923, $500,000.

The Clerk read as follows:

MIXED CLAIMS COMMISSION, UNITED STATES AND GERMANY.

For the expenses of determining the amounts of claims against Germany by the Mixed Claims Commission established under the agreement concluded between the United States and Germany on August*10, 1922, for the determination of the amount to be paid by Germany in satisfaction of the official obligations of Germany under the treaty concluded between the Governments of the United States and Germany on August 25, 1921, including the expenses which under the terms of such agreement of August 10, 1922, are chargeable in part to the United States, and the expenses of an agency of the United States to perform all necessary services in connection with the preparation of claims and the presentation thereof before said mixed commission, including salaries of an agent and necessary counsel and other assistants and employees, rent in the District of Columbia, printing and binding, contingent expenses, traveling and subsistence expenses, and other of the proper, fiscal year 1924, $222,300.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order against the proposition in order to get some information from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. I shall be very glad to give the gentleman any information I can.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There was some indirect reference to the activities of this Mixed Claims Commission in the discussion of the bill, which was under consideration a few days ago, respecting the property of German nationals. I understand that this commission were set up without any legislation by Congress, but directly under the provisions of the treaty and the agreement made between the United States and Germany. That is the fact, is it not?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes

Mr. BANKHEAD. There has been no supporting legislation for the Congress of the United States affecting this subject?

Mr. MADDEN. No; this was under the treaty ratified by the Senate

Mr. BANKHEAD. And this is the only appropriation that has been made?

Mr. MADDEN.

Mr. MADDEN. No; this is the second one. Mr. BANKHEAD. How much was the amount of the original appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. One hundred and eighty thousand dollars. BANKHEAD. And now you are providing an additional $220,000 and odd?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and it will go on for several years. Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to have some explanation of the general scope of this work.

Mr. MADDEN. I should be very glad to give it to the gen-eman. The President of the United States entered into an agreement with Germany by which a Mixed Claims Commission was appointed to consider claims of American citizens against Germany and German nationals. This commission was appointed—one by the German Government, one by the President of the United States, and the umpire, who is former Justice Day, was appointed by the President of the United States.

In addition to the two commissioners and the umpire, Germany has an agent, or what I would call a general counsel in the ordinary term, and the United States has also an agent or general counsel. There are a number of other attorneys. Applications for allowance of claims of American citizens have been filed with the Secretary of State and they have been referred to this commission. This commission began to sit here last fall. Ten thousand claims have been filed so far. The American agent who was before the Committee on Appropriations said that the claims filed would aggregate over a billion dollars. Some of these claims are questionable. Others, he said, there was no doubt about. We inquired then to see what said, there was no doubt about. We inquired then to see what progress they were making. He said they were dividing these claims into different categories, and out of each category they will take a typical case. They will then get a body of law laid down upon which they may be able to base future settlements.

on similar cases. While all of the facts and all of the law may not be exact in respect to the settlement of particular cases, they will try to lay down general principles by which the commission can be guided as to the cases in each category. have made up a number of cases and have submitted them to the court. They have argued some of these cases, the evidence is all in, and they expect to have decisions handed down in three or four or five typical cases within a very short time. In answer to a question which I asked, they said that they thought that they would be able to dispose of about 5,000 cases a year, assuming that the commission sat every day; but, taking out the period for vacation of the commission, I concluded that even if they worked very assiduously they would not be able to dispose of more than 3,500 cases a year. If there are 10,000 cases and they can dispose of 3,500 a year, they could clean this matter up in about three years, but gentlemen here will recall that the Spanish Claims Commission sat for nine years on a very small amount of claims, and nobody knows how long it will take this commission to dispose of the business before it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I thank the gentleman for that statement, and I want to ask him one or two other questions. Was the gentleman entirely accurate when he made the statement that this commission under this agreement was to determine the obligations of Germany and of the nationals of Germany?

Mr. MADDEN. I may have been mistaken about that. Mr. BANKHEAD. The bill provides, and I think the treaty also provided, that this commission should investigate only the claims of our Government against the Government of Germany.

Mr. MADDEN. I guess the gentleman is right about that. Mr. BANKHEAD. Does this commission sit in the United States or hold sessions abroad?

Mr. MADDEN. They are sitting here in Washington, and they say that they may be compelled to go to Germany at some future time, because of the difficulty of the German agents in being able to get the information on all cases.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is there any limitation put on the salaries of these numerous attorneys and agents?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. By what limitations are those salaries

By the amount of appropriation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no limitation, of course, in the treaty to fix them, and we have passed no legislation that is of law. As I understand it, the gentleman is making a lumpsum appropriation here?

Mr. MADDEN. But we have a list of salaries fixed beyond which they can not go.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Where are they fixed?

Mr. MADDEN. They are not in the law, but they are adhering to it, and it will show in the hearings just exactly what

Mr. BANKHEAD. What are the highest? Twelve thousand dollars. Mr. MADDEN.

Mr. BANKHEAD. For attorneys, counsel? Mr. MADDEN. Twelve thousand dollars for the commissioner, $10,000 for the agent who is general counsel, $6,500 for the counsel and assistant agent.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is the gentleman well satisfied that the thing is being economically and scientifically administered from his observation and investigation?

Mr. MADDEN. All the investigations we have made, and, of course, they are just at the beginning of the work, that is beginning to try cases, is that they are rather systematic about it and they have been doing the work as economically as they could. There may be some one or two cases where we thought the work was not as economical as might be. For example, there is a disbursing officer for the commission. I did not think they ought to have a disbursing officer, but that is the discretion they have, and they showed us that the work of the disbursing officer ramified into so many other things besides disbursing that after all perhaps they were justified in it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I withdraw the reservation. Mr. McDUFFIE. If the gentleman will permit, is there a time limit fixed within which they can file claims?

Mr. MADDEN. The time limit has closed.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. We originally appropriated $180,000 for this work. That seems a very large amount of money to have been expended in such a comparatively short time, and I think the committee would like to have the reasons why it was necessary to expend so much money. An agreement was arrived at originally that all claims should be filed within six months after the commission was constituted. Well, our representatives thought that was too short a time, and they compromised by arriving at an agreement that notice of all claims should be filed within six months. Now, there are some 10,000 claims, and these notices must specify with great particularity not only the name of the claimant but the character of the claim, so that the notices are almost as formal and almost as full and complete as the claims themselves will be, and it necessarily required a large force to get all these notices prepared and even to handle the documents involved in those claims. They are extremely voluminous, some of the claims comprising documents that would fill a good-sized truck. These have to be gone through and examined carefully before notices of claims can be prepared and filed in order that the rights of American claimants may be fully preserved. About 10,000 claims have already been filed. Now, the salary allowance is really very reasonable. We have one commissioner at a salary of $12,000 a year, and he has a secretary at $1,800.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. I will.
Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. In reference to the salary of the American commissioner-I happen to know the American commissioner; he was from my State originally, and now resides in New York, one of the biggest lawyers in the United States, and he could earn ten times what he is getting as commissioner.

Mr. HUSTED. Unquestionably. He receives a salary of $12,000, and he has a secretary who receives a salary of $1,800. Then the agent, who is general counsel, as the chairman of the committee has stated, receives a salary of only $10,000. other salaries are quite small: Secretary, $3,500; disbursing officer, $3,000; and then they have a counsel and assistant to agent who receives $6,500, and two counsel who receive $5,000 apiece, and then four assistant counsel, law assistants, who receive $3,000. So you can see the compensation is very reason-Of course, the work of this commission is very important and the amounts involved are very great. The aggregate amount of the claims of which notices have been filed is something over $1,000,000,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. When they are once filed, can these claims be sent up and adjudicated within a reasonable limit of time, or will this commission sit interminably, like all the others we have established for purposes of this kind?

Mr. HUSTED. Based upon our experience in the past of these international commissions it would not be likely that this work would be completed within less than 30 years, but our agent says he expects this work will be completed within five years.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope we will remember that prediction and at the end of five years cut off this appropriation, because I think the work ought to be done certainly within that period of time.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The American commissioner was Mr. E. B. Parker, of Houston, Tex., and New York.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. HUSTED. Yes, sir.
Mr. STAFFORD. When does the time expire for the presentation of these claims?

April 7, 1923, I think. Mr. HUSTED.

Mr. STAFFORD. We passed an act recently extending the time for the presentation of these claims-

Mr. HUSTED. It expires April 7 of this year. Under the agreement no notices can be filed after that date.

Mr. STAFFORD. Another question: Has Germany contributed her share toward the maintenance of the expenses of this commission?

Mr. HUSTED. These are expenses for which we conclusively pay. Germany pays under the expenses of her agency. The joint expenses of the commission are divided between the two countries

Mr. STAFFORD. So that the work of this commission is not represented by the amount that the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from New York have referred to?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes. I think everything is included here. Mr. STAFFORD. Only the expenditure that the American Government is responsible for, not the expenditure that the German Government is responsible for.

Mr. HUSTED. Oh, no. This is only what it costs us. I did not understand the gentleman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INQUIRY INTO EXTRATERRITORIALITY IN CHINA.

The unexpended balance of the appropriation of $21,000 to enable the United States Government to carry out its obligations arising under Resolution No. 5, adopted by the Conference on the Limitation of stood.

Armament December 10, 1921, regarding extraterritoriality in China, made by the act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiclary, approved June 1, 1922, is made available for the purposes therein described for the fiscal year 1924.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish for just a moment to call attention to some apparent inconsistencies. This bill is denominated the "Third deficiency appropriation bill." As a matter of fact, for the Sixty-seventh Congress, which is the present Congress, this is the eighth deficiency bill.

Mr. MADDEN. No; that is not correct.

Mr. BLANTON. I will show you in a minute. It is the eighth. We have had so many deficiency bills in the Sixtyseventh Congress that the gentleman has lost count. [Laughter.]

Now, besides all the big supply bills-the regular appropriation bills—when we have passed this we shall have passed eight deficiency bills in the Sixty-seventh Congress, as follows:

The first deficiency bill in the Sixty-seventh Congress was for $106,000,000, in round numbers; the second deficiency bill was $50,500,000, in round numbers; the third deficiency bill was $105,000,000, in round numbers; the fourth deficiency bill was for $137,000,000, in round numbers; the fifth deficiency bill was for $47,000,000, in round numbers; the sixth deficiency bill was for $2,500,000, in round numbers; and the seventh deficiency bill was for $75,000,000. The eighth one—this one—which makes the eighth deficiency bill for the present Sixty-seventh Congress, is for $154,000,000.

Now, I want to ask the distinguished gentleman from Illinois one question.

Mr. MADDEN. You can ask as many as you like, Mr. BLANTON. We are to adjourn next Sunda We are to adjourn next Sunday for nine months. [Applause.] What precaution has the gentleman from Illinois taken to prevent these departments here in Washington from going over the limit of expenditure set by Congress during that nine months' vacation? I want to put those departments on notice right now, and I am not a member of the Committee on Appropriations but merely a humble Member of this Congress. Just as surely as they violate the law I am going to see to it that one time at least in the history of this Nation there is action taken against them for violating the law of this land.

They have no right to spend more money than this Congress authorizes. It is just one deficiency bill after another, and that is why the expenses of this Nation have grown and grown until the people are groaning because they are overburdened with taxation to meet it.

I hope the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of this great committee, I hope his committee, I hope the steering committee of this House, and I hope the majority and the minority will notify these departments that they have got to keep within the limit or action is going to be taken against them for violating the law of this land.

Now does the gentleman from Illinois want to ask me a question?

Mr. MADDEN. No. Mr. BLANTON. I did not think you did.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to make a statement on my own account.

The gentleman from Texas spoke as though everything in these deficiency bills is for current obligations of the Government, and he would lead the country to believe that that is so. That is not so. We are paying the obligations of the war in these deficiency bills. Very little of it has to do with the current activities of the Government. Of the amount carried in this bill $78,000,000, for example, is for the return of taxes illegally paid. Those taxes were paid in 1917, 1918, and 1919. Nobody is complaining about that. The fact that they were illegally collected and paid demands that they should be returned.

Thirteen million dollars is carried in this bill because of the fact that the insurance premiums paid by men who served under the flag during the war were not sufficient to meet the cost. Does the gentleman complain about that? Does the gentleman say he would not pay it? Does the gentleman from Texas say he would not pay it? Does the gentleman from taxes allegally paid, many of them perhaps in his own State?

Mr. BLANTON. I am not complaining about that. I am complaining about their exceeding their authority.

Mr. MADDEN. But the gentleman did not make his speech with any other object than to have the purpose of the committee misunderstood. It was his purpose to have it misunder-

Mr. BLANTON. No; I wanted it understood.
Mr. MADDEN. No; you are not the only Member of Congress that is interested in doing what is right. [Applause.] We are interested, and I challenge the gentleman to point his finger to any item in any one of the bills to which he has referred that is not justified as an item. We are not appropriating money profligately; we are paying the Government's bills, whether they were created over in France, or created in Texas, or in Illinois. Whether they were created in 1915, 1916, 1917, or 1918, or 1919, or 1920 makes no difference. There is very little in this bill out of the whole $154,000,000 that has anything to do with the current year's business. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to

Mr. BUTLER. Arr. Charman, will the gentleman serior a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to ask this question, Is not there a mistake here in the use of the word "deficiency" as commonly understood? To the ordinary mind of the ordinary man-and I am an ordinary man-the word "deficiency" means that the administrative officers have spent more money in the maintenance of the Government than we had authorized them to spend. The gentleman's explanation is satisfactory to me and would be to everyone if you would call these items by their right names.

ames. They are not deficiencies.
Mr. MADDEN. They are not.
Mr. BUTLER. They are claims.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

MINISTER TO LUXEMBURG.

The balance of the appropriation for the fiscal year 1923 and the appropriation for the fiscal year 1924 for the salary of the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the Netherlands and Luxemburg shall be available for the salary of the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the Netherlands.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to the paragraph. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois in reference to it.

Mr. MADDEN. The minister to the Netherlands is now acting as minister to Luxemburg. The Belgian Government and Luxemburg have formed an economic alliance, and the President thinks that it is the wise thing under that economic alliance to let the minister of the Netherlands act as minister to Luxemburg

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. That is all right. Mr. Chairman,

I withdraw my reservation of a point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION AT RIO DE JANEIRO, BRAZIL.

The appropriation of $1,000,000 authorized by Joint Resolution No. 25, approved November 2, 1921, for the expenses of taking part in an international exposition to be held at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, which was made by the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1922, approved December 15, 1921, is hereby made available for the fiscal year 1924, and the Secretary of State may expend not to exceed $15,000 of the balance of the appropriation, not required for the expenses of participation in the exposition, for the alteration, adaptation, and furnishing of the exposition building and improvement of the grounds thereof for permanent use as residence and offices of the diplomatic representative of the United States to Brazil; and not to exceed $30,000 for the purchase of additional land adjoining the site now owned by the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read. Most Members of the House will recall that when the original authorization bill providing $1,000,000 to make an exhibition at Rio de Janeiro to celebrate the centennial which was to last nine weeks, I strongly contended that it was too large an appropriation. Five hundred thousand dollars would have been large enough in view of the rate of exchange, it beeing about three to one in favor of this country, making $500,000, equal to one million and a half. Now, we find that they have a surplus fund, and I want to congratulate whoever had the disbursement of the fund that they have some surplus. My purpose in rising is to inquire how much was expended for buildings and how much for salaries of commissioners, which was a nice junket for some specially favored

Mr. MADDEN. The amount expended so far has been $860,000. All of the material that can be brought back must find its way back at some cost for transportation, which must be taken out of the $140,000 remaining. There was spent $350,000 for the erection of a building and the purchase of the There was spent land upon which it stands. It is peculiarly adapted to the home of an ambassador, and it is proposed to turn that over to the State Department, have it remodeled and refurnished at a cost not to exceed $15,000, and to buy an adjoining piece of land to prevent the destruction of the beauty of the place by the erection of some building not adapted to the surroundings in the neighborhood at a cost of $30,000. The two items together make the $45,000 which we propose to take out of the $140,000 yet remaining. Some question has been raised as to the propriety of our turning the building over to the Government of the United States. The Government owns it. If it does not use it for the home of the ambassador, for the office of the ambassador, we will have to give it away or sell it at a nominal Three hundred and fifty thousand dollars has been invested in it. It has a beautiful site and was erected, I may say, with a view of turning it over later for the home of the American ambassador and his offices. I think that nothing we can do with the money that remains, or that part we propose to use, could be used to a better advantage than the purpose for which this provision in the bill applies.

Mr. STAFFORD. The only surprise I have, in view of the large amount of money that was expended in the construction of this building, is as to the smallness of the estimate made for furnishing it-$15,000.

Mr. MADDEN. There is some furniture there that was used during the exposition which can be utilized.

Mr. PORTER. And the building does not require any remodeling.

Mr. MADDEN. And I am informed that it requires very little remodeling

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice the gentleman that has charge of the State Department appropriation bill is in his seat. Will the gentleman inform the House what the total upkeep is for light and heat, and so forth, for Government-owned ambassador buildings?

Mr. HUSTED. I can not give the gentleman any information on that, but I can give him some further information on this item if he wishes it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should like to have it. The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gen The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent Mr. STAFFORD. to proceed for three minutes more,

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUSTED. This is immediately adjoining the grounds on which the present exposition buildings stand, and it is necessary to acquire it in order to protect our property interests. It would be a wise thing to acquire it, even if we did not intend to utilize it for any particular purpose; but it is the intention of the Government, if approved by the Congress, to erect upon that additional strip a building, where we can have our consular offices and where the military and naval attachés' offices may be located, so that we will have all of our Government activities in the city located on that property and is fitted for diplomatic purposes?

Mr. STAFFORD. This new building is centrally located

Mr. HUSTED. It is centrally located, and it was designed in the beginning for an embassy.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order. Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if he consulted the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs with reference to this particular legis-

Mr. MADDEN. I am not at all sure about that, but I understood the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs was quite agreeable to this. Yet I do not know how I reached that Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the House to a situation into which this House is drifting under the rule which we adopted here last Congress, I believe it was, providing for the creation of a single Committee on Appropriations. I was one of those who voted for the creation of one Committee on Appropriations, and I did so upon the theory that that committee would observe the rules of this House. I thought the system worth a trial.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. The gentleman does not contend that this division is subject to the point of order?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do.

But it is not subject to the point of order. Mr. HUSTED. Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Oh, yes; it is. However, I am not going to argue that with the gentleman. Everyone except the gentleman from New York knows that it is subject to the point of order, because you are providing here for an appropriation to buy a site, not for exposition purposes but for a residence for the American ambassador to Brazil; and that is subject to a point of order. The making available for another purpose money already appropriated is legislation.

Mr. MADDEN. We are just turning over the property we do own for a particular purpose.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. You are appropriating $30,000 to buy additional ground and are authorizing money already appropriated for one purpose to be used for another purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. But it is adjacent ground.
Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am not going to further argue the point of order. Under the system we adopted, thinking the Appropriations Committee would confine itself to appropriations and would not absorb the jurisdiction of many of the other committees of the House, it was my hope that we should do something that would contribute to legislative efficiency. But, lo and behold, this is only an isolated instance in a long list of repeated infractions of that rule by the Committee on Appropriations; and if this system continues with the acceleration which it has already acquired it will not be long until the other committees of the House, formerly invested with appropriating powers, might as well abdicate every function they theoretically possess. We created a great committee which is absorbing gradually the functions of all of the other committees of the House, except that of the Committee on Rules, and we generally find the Rules Committee subservient to the will of the Committee on Appropriations and to the leader of the majority

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes. Mr. MADDEN. If I thought this was subject to a point of order we would not have put it into the bill; but we looked it up, and I am quite sure it is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am not criticizing the gentle-man from Illinois. He is an excellent gentleman and a fine member of the Committee on Appropriations and a great chairman of that committee. I believe he is doing fine work on that committee, but I am condemning the system that makes it possible, not for the gentleman from Illinois but for any chairman or any committee to absorb practically all the functions of this House. The committee grows stronger as it fattens on see The committee grows stronger as it fattens on each newly acquired power and thereby more easily prevails in each new contest. This is a matter which should have gone to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. A moment ago we adopted another provision transferring diplomatic representation to Luxemburg from the minister to the Netherlands to the ambassador to Belgium. Was the Committee on Foreign Affair about that? No. Why? Oh, it is not necessary. carry it into the House on an appropriation bill." Was the Committee on Foreign Affairs consulted "We will

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes. Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman spoke of the power of the Committee on Appropriations being only exceeded by that of the Committee on Rules. Now that the chairman of the Committee on Rules has become the Speaker of the House, what would the gentleman say of the czarism of the days of Uncle Joe Cannon?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am trying to deal with modern history, not ancient. I have not time to discuss that matter. because I am discussing the system that we have created. am not criticizing individual members of the Committee on Appropriations. They are excellent gentlemen, but I am criticising the system that the House has adopted, and the manner cising the system that the House has adopted, and the manner of administering that system this House is permitting itself to fall into. When the committee brings in an appropriation bill which has upon it a provision that is out of order, if it is an important one, the Committee on Rules makes it in order, and the result is that all legislation of a pressing or important character is carried on appropriation bills. How did we fix the size of the Army? We have a great Committee on Military Affairs, but instead of that committee deciding the size of the Army, we decided it in a rider on an appropriation bill. Army, we decided it in a rider on an appropriation bill.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman does not mean to say that we get things made in order by rules.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. You have done it.

Mr. MADDEN. Absolutely not. We have not had a single

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Was there not one on the naval appropriation bill?

Mr. MADDEN. We did not ask for it. Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. But somebody did. I am not criticizing the gentleman individually, I am criticizing the system which we have erected. The size of the Army was de-termined by the Committee on Appropriations. When it came to scrapping ships, when it came to the question of disarmament, was not an amendment adopted on an appropriation bill under a rule settling that great question, while the Naval Affairs Committee sat off in some room twiddling its thumbs?

What is the necessity for the existence of all of these committees of the House if the House is to strip them of authority and place that authority in the Committee on Appropriations? I do not care whether it is 15 or 35, there are not 35 men big enough, there are not 35 men wise enough, there are not 35 men patriotic enough in this House, or out of it, for that matter, to wisely and safely control the great bulk of legislation that 110,000,000 people have solemnly under the Constitution confided to 435 Representatives of the American people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. Mr. HUDSPETH. I desire to offer the following amendment. Mr. BLANTON. I think there is a reservation of a point

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I withdraw the point of order. Mr. BLANTON. I make it, that it is legislation on an appropriation bill unauthorized by law.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it is too late. Mr. BLANTON. I made it just as soon as the gentleman withdrew his point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Let us have a ruling. It is not subject to the point of order. I would like to make this further statement about it: We own the site on which this building is erected. We propose to turn the building and site which we already own over for governmental use. If it is not used for governmental purposes, it will be practically thrown away, and I do not suppose anybody wants to do that.

Mr. BLANTON. It was ruled out of the legislative bill on a point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. This item was not in the legislative bill.

Mr. MADDEN. This item.
Mr. BLANTON. In the other bill.
Mr. MADDEN. It never was in the legislative bill.
Mr. BLANTON. I mean the regular appropriation bill.
Mr. MADDEN. This was never in any bill—this has never
Mr. MADDEN. This was never in any bill—this has never been before the House before. We own the land on which the building stands, and we want to buy a piece of land that adjoins the building—immediately adjoining it. There can be no doubt about our right to do that. It is a work in progress.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. MADDEN. Yes.
Mr. WINGO. As I understand this is a building which was authorized by a special act to be erected for exposition pur-

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. And now it is proposed by this proviso to transfer it to the Diplomatic Service ultimately and to buy adjoining land.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 114), signed November 2, 1921, accepting the invitation of the Republic of Brazil to take part in an international exposition to be held at Rio de Janiero in 1922, in section 3, contains this language:

SEC. 3. That officers and employees of the executive departments and other branches and institutions of the Government in charge of or responsible for the safe-keeping of objects, articles, etc., property of the United States, which it is desired to axhibit, may permit such property to pass out of their possession for the purpose of being transported to and from and exhibited at said exposition as may be requested by the commissioner general, such exhibits and articles to be returned to the respective departments and institutions to which they belong at the close of the exposition: Provided, That the commissioner general, with the approval of the President, at the close of the exposition, may make such disposition of the buildings and other property of the United States used at the exposition, which it will not be feasible to return to the United States, as he may deem advisable.

This provision here also contains the authority for the pur-chase of contiguous land. The Chair is of the opinion that it is clearly authorized by law and therefore overrules the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

JUDGMENTS, UNITED STATES COURTS.

For payment of the final judgments and decrees, including costs of sults, which have been rendered under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," as amended, certified to Congress during the present session by the Attorney General in House Document No. 573, and which have not been appealed, namely.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 42, after line 14, add a new paragraph as follows:
"To authorize the Secretary of State to make a survey of the Rio Grande at or near El Paso. Tex., for the purpose of controlling the flood waters, said survey to be made under the direction of the Reclamation Department of the Interior Department, $35,000."

Mr. MADDEN. I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I will try not to take up any more time than necessary. I know the gentleman wants to get through with this bill, and I want to assist him and, furthermore, I know my friend from Iowa [Mr. Green] has a very important bill he would like to get passed this evening. I would like to state this, that under the treaty existing between this country and Mexico people on this side can not take any steps toward curbing the overflow until a survey is made by this Government. No private citizen is able to build levees to protect the water from overflowing from this river on his own land, and this appropriation and survey is recommended by the Secretary of State; it is also recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, and, as I understand, the President submitted a letter to the Committee on Appropriations asking it be made.

Mr. MADDEN. I wonder if the gentleman would not allow me to tell the House why it was not incorporated in the bill.

I would be glad to do it.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I want to finish my statement. I think I am correct in the statements I have made.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. Mr. HUDSPETH. The President submitted the matter to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Now we are in this attitude. No citizen of this side, although this river during the spring season overflows and destroys valuable property on this side and cuts off valuable property into Mexico, can do anything unless the survey is made-and this is directing a survey—and after the survey then the citizens will take the necessary steps to protect themselves. Under the treaty they can not make it, unless the Secretary of State orders a survey, which he is willing and ready to do and which he so stated in a letter to the President, and which the President submitted to the chairman of the Appropriations Commit-tee, as you will see in the hearings. This will not be for the benefit of El Paso alone, but for the benefit of many landowners below El Paso and a large portion of the lands embraced in the national irrigation project. The engineer before the committee, who came from the War Department, stated that El Paso was built in the bed of the Rio Grande and that water overflowed the cellars of all its houses. This is true as to only a small portion of the city. El Paso is a beautiful city, built on the slopes of a range of mountains, and it is largely for the protection of the farmers below El Paso and to protect American territory that this survey is asked.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Huds-

PETH] concedes it.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think it would be fair to pass it over because the gentleman from Texas would not know why it was not in the bill. There are some other reasons which I think the House ought to know.

The President of the United States sent an estimate to Con-cess for $35,000 for a survey of the Rio Grande River around El Paso. It was stated by a good many people, and I think by some of the gentlemen who came before the committee with the gentleman from Texas, that El Paso was in danger on account of the flood waters, and that the Elephant Butte Dam, in the reclamation project out in that section of the country, was the cause of the flood which jeopardized the safety of El Paso.

Mr. HUDSPETH. It was a contributing cause, I will say to the gentleman, Mr. MADDEN.

to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. The Committee on Appropriations sent for the Chief of Engineers. The Chief of Engineers had evidently already taken time by the forelock and had a preliminary survey made by one of his engineers. The engineer communicated with the head of the Reclamation Service out in that section of the country, and the reply came that five-eighths of the danger formerly existing around El Paso on account of floods had been eliminated by the construction of the Elephant Butte Dam. Instead of emphasizing the danger, it eliminated five-eighths of the former danger.

Further, it was proved beyond any question that this is not an international question. There is no international problem involved in it. The Rio Grande River is not a navigable stream. There is a reclamation project that comes to the limits of The drainage area of the Rio Grande above the Ele-El Paso. phant Butte Dam is 30,000 square miles and below the dam and above El Paso about 8,000 square miles.

The city of El Paso is built in the bed of the Rio Grande If this $35,000 were expended for a survey it would River. If this $35,000 were expended for a survey it would commit the Government of the United States to what? To the building of an artificial channel which would cause overflows on the lands below. It would cause damage to the lands below and the Government would have to pay. The cost of the work might run up to $10,000,000. There is no international problem there, and no problem of navigation connected with it. There is no mechanical equipment, $60,000; in all, $150,000.

problem of reclamation connected with it. The only problem that is involved in the survey that is proposed here is, first, to spend $35,000 to make a survey, and thereby make the Government of the United States liable for a further expenditure of anywhere from $3,000,000 to $10,000,000, and there is not anybody anywhere in the world interested in the problem except the city of El Paso.

Now, what is the city of El Paso interested in? They have a swamp in the city of El Paso, covering about a thousand acres of land. They propose by the expenditure of this money to drain that swamp.

Now, one more thing: They have built the city of El Paso on the old bed of the Rio Grande River, and the soil upon which these houses are built is gravel and sand mixed, and when there is high water on the Rio Grande it percolates through that soil into the basements of the houses of El Paso, and the basements are wet and they want to drain them, and they propose to have this survey, which in the first instance will cost $35,000 to make, and then anywhere from $3,000,000 to $10,000,000, to drain the basements of the city of El Paso and to drain the swamp.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN, Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The evidence before the committee shows the number of acres of land on the reclamation project. Mr. Burgess testified to that. I think the gentleman will concede that the citizenship of El Paso can not proceed until this survey is made through the Secretary of State.

Mr. MADDEN. The Secretary of State has no right or power or facilities to make the survey, and the only way to make the survey is through the Board of Army Engineers, who have all the facilities and all the facts.

Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr.

HUDSPETH] want to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes. I want to state, Mr. Chairman, that there is ample authority for making this survey under the act creating the Boundary Commission. There was ample au-thority cited before the committee by Major Burgess. The Secretary of State has stated to me and to Mr. Burgess, the representative of El Paso before the committee, that under the act creating the Boundary Commission there is ample authority for making this survey and asking for the appropriation, and it can only be made by authority of the Secretary of State. I desire to cite the Chair to the treaty between this country and Mexico and to the act creating the United States-Mexico Boundary Commission, where I feel sure the Chair will find ample authority for overruling the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to have some time to look it up. Will the gentleman let it go over for a while?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes; I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of damages caused by collision of Coast Guard cutter Mackingo with the Italian steamer Stromboll, belonging to the Navigazione Generale Italiana, Genoa, Italy, $425.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WINGO. I was under the impression that we had provided by general law for taking care of claims of this kind. Has that bill passed the Senate?

Mr. MADDEN. There is a law, but they have to come to us with the claim and all the data. These are the amounts

Mr. WINGO. I was under the impression that we had passed a bill authorizing the department to settle all claims under $1,000 and that they had a lump-sum appropriation to pay them out of. Was not that the law, or was it $600?

Mr. MADDEN, They must come to Congress for the appropriation. Mr. WINGO. Even under that law they must come to Congress?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; they must certify to Congress and have an appropriation.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF SUPERVISING ARCHITECT.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

National Leper Home, Carville, La.: For the erection of additional suitable buildings in accordance with the authority contained in the act approved February 20, 1923 (Public No. 430, Sixty-seventh Congress), $500,000, and in addition the Secretary of the Treasury may incur obligations for the foregoing purpose in amounts not exceeding $145,000.

The amendment was agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

Operating supplies, public buildings: For fuel, steam, gas for light-g and heating purposes, etc., including the same objects specified ader this head in the Treasury Department for the fiscal year 1923,

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "fuel" in line 19.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Amendment of Mr. ROGERS: Page 44, line 19, strike out the word

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I have offered the pro forma amendment in order to ask the chairman of the committee one or two questions concerning the requested appropriation of $400,000 for the continuance of the work of what is called the special Coal Fact Finding Commission. I notice in the newspapers of Saturday the following dispatch:

COAL COMMISSION MUST HAVE $400,000 OR QUIT.

Washington, February 24.—Members of the coal commission have informed the congressional Appropriations Committee that unless Congress finds it possible to give the $400,000 special additional appropriation which the commission has sought in carrying on its work of fact finding in the coal industry its activities will cease on March 4.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the act authorizing the Coal Fact Finding Commission limited the expenditure to $200,000. There was an estimate sent to Congress by the President for We considered the estimate and heard the commission. They told us what they have done and what they They say they have spent about $100,000 so far and unless they get the other $400,000 they will have to quit work. They say with the added money they will be able to complete the work in the time fixed by law; but they must have the additional $400,000 or they must cease to work after March 4.

They will have $100,000 of the $200,000 left; but they say it is better to turn that back into the Treasury than to go on and spend the remainder and not have a complete report. Committee on Appropriations are in hearty sympathy with the fact-finding commission. We would like very much to have recommended an appropriation of $400,000, but we realize that there is no law which authorizes us to do it. So we come to the House without having any recommendation to make. There is a bill pending-how far it has proceeded I do not knowbefore the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee increasing the amount that may be spent to $600,000. I do not know what progress the bill has made. But I really believe that the facts that may be found by the commission, as far as I can see the work they have done already, would justify the expenditure of a very large sum of money.

Mr. ROGERS. Does not the gentleman think that with the coal crisis as it is to-day it would be most unfortunate for every reason if this commission had to go out of existence next week?

Mr. MADDEN. I do. Mr. ROGERS. And if the gentleman has an opportunity at a later stage of this very bill he will be in sympathy with the increase of the appropriation.

Mr. MADDEN. I have been in sympathy with it all the time.
Mr. ROGERS. And the only reason that it is not in the bill now is because, under the rules of the House, it is not in order.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. Mr. BLANTON, Mr. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion. I may state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that possibly the gentleman from Texas is to blame for that legislative bill not coming up for passage, because I objected to it under the unanimous consent and it went off the cal-endar. I did that to save this additional $400,000, because I believe that the $200,000 already appropriated is going to be wasted. The wintertime is almost over.

Mr. ROGERS. I think I can say with confidence that a vote of the House on that question would show that there would be 434 Members to 1.

Mr. BLANTON. It may be so, but the vote of the people who sent me here is just about in the same proportion the other way.

Mr. ROGERS. Oh, the gentleman lives in Texas and does not know the conditions in the northern part of this country at this very moment.

Mr. BLANTON. Perhaps not, but I know the conditions in Washington. There are thousands of poor families in Washington right now unable to get coal at any price, and they have not the money to pay $16 or $17 a ton for it, if it were procurable.

Mr. ROGERS. So the gentleman wants to keep the peopla of the United States in the dark and allow this commission to die which has just got under way?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not want the so-called Fact Finding Coal Commission to spend all of the money out of the Treasury while the people freeze and get no benefit at all.

Mr. MADDEN. They have already gotten the benefit. They got a settlement of the wage scale.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope the commission will not get the extra $400,000. I am going to be one man to fight and vote against it.

Mr. ROGERS. I hope that-Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I am I Oh, I am not going to yield any further to the gentleman. He has had his say. The facts which that committee would be able to get, if you gave them the $400,000, which the gentleman from Massachusetts ought to know, because he is a smart man in a way, would not be applicable to conditions which might exist next winter. It is coal next winter that the people want, and the conditions may change.

Mr. ROGERS. Do we not want information as a preliminary to the getting of the coal?

Mr. BLANTON. What are you going to do with it after you get it?

Mr. ROGERS. Legislate wisely.
Mr. BLANTON. Oh, wisely. When we were paying $25 for pair of shoes during the war I heard the President of the United States come here and tell you that there was just one way to stop it. He told you to make the manufacturer stamp on the sole leather of the shoe the cost to him, and then on the box stamp the middleman's cost and the retailer's cost, and let the people find out where the main profit was going—at a time when you could hardly get enough for the cowhide after you sold it to pay for the skinning of the cow. But you turned the President of the United States down. You did not require that to be done. You seek to take $400,000 more to get facts, and after you find out the facts you will not do anything about them, but will hide them away in the document room and let the poor people freeze.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, before the Clerk begins to read, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the Botanic Garden.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection. The Clerk read as follows:

INLAND AND COASTWISE WATERWAYS SERVICE.

For additional expenses incurred in the operation of boats, barges, tugs, and other transportation facilities on the inland, canal, and coastwise waterways acquired by the United States in pursuance of the fourth paragraph of section 6 of the Federal control act of March 21, 1918, and operated in pursuance of section 201 of the transportation act approved February 28, 1920, to remain available until June 30, 1924, $500,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of rder. What is the purpose of this $500,000 appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. During the war the railroad administration established barge lines on the Mississippi and other rivers, inland waters of the country, to supplement the rail transporta-tion facilities of the country. There was established a barge line on the Warrior River and also on the Mississippi River, in connection with which a large number of barges have been either purchased or built and operated. It transpires that within the last year or more there have been a good many sandbars on the Mississippi River, and, although the Mississippi River barge line has been making quite a considerable amount of money these impediments to navigation caused considerable loss. There is a loss on the Warrior River operations. They have the barges and they have the business. They have been making money on the Mississippi River and the profits there have gone to make up the losses on the Warrior. last year they have been losing money on both.

You can not dispose of a system of transportation over night, whether it be a railroad or a waterway. We have the barges, we have the lines, we have the communications, we have the rail connections, we have our rates all along the Mississippi River, and into the tributary territory we have made rates—that is, the barge line has—which is a Government institution. They are compelled to take the freight. They may take it and operate at a loss for a period. This $500,000 is to meet the losses for the next 10 months.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, does it run behind that much? Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. They are doing well.

The barge line has about $602,000 in quick Mr. MADDEN. assets. They could dispose of the assets if we were going to close down the transportation line and come within $2,000 of paying every bill that they owe, but they must have money with which to run the business, as any other business must, and the $500,000 proposed to be appropriated now is to enable the barge line authorized by law, operating in connection with railroads, making joint rates, carrying freight to every section of this territory, to function.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Government lose the $500,000?

Mr. MADDEN. If we lose it all, it can not be helped. Seven million dollars have been invested in this barge line.

Mr. BUTLER. But the gentleman would not want us to keep this thing right along if we are going to lose $500,000 a year

Mr. MADDEN. I do not say that we will lose it. They say they expect to be put in a position where they can recoup if we give them that money, and where they can show a profit next year. They will owe this money and they must pay it

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I want to say to my friend also that the whole proposition shows a great profit provided you could get a proper division of the rates. In one instance on the Warrior River there is a carriage of about 135 miles, about 25 miles of this by railroad, and the railroad gets 80 per cent of the freight rate. If the Interstate Commerce Commission would give us an equitable division, this would show a magnificent profit.

Mr. MADDEN. And they are working on that.

Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. Chairman, the reason I rose is because I was taken aback by the testimony before the subcommittee on the War Department appropriation bill, which carries the item for the operation of the inland waterway service. Last year, by reason of the exigent conditions, and in order to provide a working fund, the committee voted $300,000 to this service, so as to tide over any emergencies that might arise. When the head of this service was before the committee this year we examined him as to the need of additional funds, and he stated, as I recall it, that he did not need any further emergency fund, and that $300,000 that we voted last year was sufficient to act as a working balance and to meet some of the losses that were being occasioned on the Warrior River.

As I recall, the Mississippi River a year or two ago made some $200,000 or $300,000 profit from operation, which made up part of the loss on the Warrior, and it was necessary to provide a working fund in order to keep the service going and have the service so, in case an emergency arose, they would not be hamstrung and without funds to operate the vessels. Now we find them coming in here for an additional emergency fund of $500,000. I am rather surprised it is presented, in view of the testimony given before the regular committee which has control of this appropriation, but I think that the real reason for this is an exigency. I know nothing of the hearings. We have had during this last year conditions that do not confront the country in a decade by reason of drought that prevailed from May until November. Navigation on the Mississippi River was absolutely suspended for some six weeks and on the Ohio was suspended for some two or three months, something unheard of on the Mississippi, during the entire navigation season, and I think this demand arose largely by reason of that exceptional condition of drought. Following the flood waters of the early spring there came this exceptional drought, when there was no water at all, and the Mississippi River service itself suffered a loss. Otherwise there would have been undoubtedly sufficient funds. I am surprised-

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. STAFFORD. I ask for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.]

The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am surprised that the head of the service did not testify as to the need of this fund last month when we prepared our appropriation bill. That is what I am surprised at, and that is why I rose to make the inquiry.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield? I am seeking information.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will,

Mr. TILSON. I would like to inquire what is the difference between that and a subsidy? Is not this merely subsidizing this service on the Warrior River?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a subsidy so far as the Warrior River is concerned, but as far as-

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is a Government-owned line

Mr. TILSON. After all, what is the difference?

Mr. STAFFORD. Government funds are being used for the special benefit of a certain community, and though it is not very palatable to Members of the South to call it a subsidy when it applies to a southern locality, it is really a subsidy in effect. But I am not going into the merits of that. fund is occasioned by exigent conditions which prevailed on the Mississippi. If they had had normal conditions prevailing on the Mississippi last year they would have been able to have made money and would not have had to have this appropriation for this reserve fund. Under these circumstances I withdraw the reservation of the point of order, expressing surprise that the head of the service did not bring this need to the attention of the committee that had control of this appropria-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the reservation and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

AUDITED CLAIMS.

SEC. 2. That for the payment of the following claims, certified to be due by the General Accounting Office under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of section 5 of the act of June 20, 1874, and under appropriations heretofore treated as permanent, being for the service of the fiscal year 1920 and prior years, unless otherwise stated, and which have been certified to Congress under section 2 of the act of July 7, 1884, as fully set forth in House Document No. 574, reported to Congress at its present session, there is appropriated as follows:

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to speak for 10 minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may speak for 10 minutes out of order.

Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.
Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to say a word about some members of the Committee on Appropriations. We have leaving us on the 4th of March several members of the Committee on Appropriations, three of whom are here present on this occasion. I will begin what I have to say by calling attention to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. Husted], who has acted as chairman of the subcommittee on the Departments of State and Justice. [Applause.] There never has been in the history of the Congress a more loyal, devoted public servant than Mr. HUSTED. I have leaned on him. He has been of wonderful assistance to me as chairman of this subcommittee. I could rely upon him, because he was always clean, always ready. He is an investigator; he never allowed anything to pass to the pages of a bill that he reported to the House that was not thoroughly justified. He has been a wonderful Member of the House. I regret his leaving. I hoped that in the coming Congress that we might have the benefit of his judgment and experience. I feel under deep obligation to him and, in fact, to every member of the Committee on Appropriations. Whatever success the committee has had is due to the loyalty and devotion and unity of the members of the committee, not to the chairman. There never was a band of men more loyal, more devoted, more unselfish, more patriotic, more able than these men of this committee. I shall regret more than any other man that so many of them who have been found tried and true are soon to leave us. The two men I want particularly to call attention to after having passed from my friend Huster are two Members who have served on the War Department subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations. They have been criticized by those who wanted a larger Army, and they have stood loyally by the Nation. When I appointed . WILL STAFFORD to membership on the War Department subcommittee [applause] people thought I had a grudge against him. But I knew why I appointed him. I knew he had the industry and the integrity and courage to stand up under pressure, and I knew if there was any place anywhere in the service of the Nation that needed courage and integrity to stand up under pressure that was the place, and I knew I could trust him. [Applause.] Now, I did not tell him that then; I only tell it now; I want the country to know it. But there never has been a more loyal, industrious public servant in any place within the gift of the Government, either State or Nation, than our friend WILL STAFFORD. [Applause.]

My heart goes with him wherever he goes. confidence and esteem. He carries my promise to be with him everywhere, to think with him, to act with him, to serve with him in any way I can at any time I can during the rest of my life, for he has been worthy of it. [Applause.]

The people of Wisconsin can not have understood the caliber of the man. He has saved the Government more money than any other man we have in this House. It did not make any difference who the man was or what the object was, if Mr. STAFFORD thought the subject before us for consideration had not merit he objected. He did not yield from his objection at the pleading of any man. He has been devoted to the Treasury-to the Nation. His ideal has been to be a great public servant. He has lived up to that ideal. [Applause.

The Nation owes him a debt of obligation, and this House owes him its sincere thanks. [Applause.]

Now I come to my friend Tom Sisson. [Applause.] Everybody knows that I am a Republican-a rock-ribbed one-and everybody knows that Tom Sisson is a Democrat, unyielding; that we have not anything in common when it comes to politics. But between men we stand alike. [Applause,]

I have served with a good many men in a good many places, both in public and in private life, and I have never yet met the man who goes so thoroughly into anything he undertakes as Tom Sisson does. [Applause.] You could not get a silver cent—and that is a small atom—through any crack in the Treasury of the United States unless Tom Sisson was satisfled that it was justified. He is the most painstaking man in the consideration of appropriation bills that I have ever seenthorough, unselfish, devoted, untiring—and there has never been an hour, not a day, that I have called upon him or any other member of the committee when he did not respond. have called on Sisson to act on committees that he was not a member of. I have called on him in the middle of the night. It made no difference what was the hour or what was the

What a great pity that men of the experience of these men and of their ability, of their unselfishness, must leave the public service. I wonder if the people of the United States understand what these men do? If they did, they would never let them go. No people of any district would have influence enough with the people of America who understood the value of these men to keep them away from a service which they have so well rendered.

Tom, I love you. [Applause.] You have been wonderful, all of you, and when you go back home and once again mix with the masters of us public servants, I know you will exercise an influence that will tend to educate these people in a knowledge of the integrity of purpose of men who devote them-selves to this class of work. There never has been a suspicion selves to this class of work. There never has been a suspicion anywhere as to the cleanliness or honesty of any of these men. There has never been a dollar reported to the House with their sanction that did not seem justified. If they could see any way that they could do the work that was required to be done through an appropriation for 50 cents, I am sure nobody would get 55 cents. If the department said they wanted a dollar, Tom Sisson would always try to compromise at least on 50 cents. [Applause.] If he has not been economical in the expenditure of the public funds, no man ever has been. And if Will Stafford ever allowed a bad case to get by that cost a dollar, I would like to get the picture of the case. [Applause. l

Boys, we are going to miss you in the next Congress. We Boys, we are going to miss you in the next congress. We will remember you wherever you may go. I want you to feel that the House of Representatives, or those of us who remain, appreciate what you have done here, and I particularly appreciate the work you have done on the Committee on Appropriations.

I wish everybody could know it as I know it. I wish everyone could understand these men as I understand them. There is not a thing in the world that they might want that they could not have if they were understood as I understand them. God bless you, and preserve you, and keep you well and happy and prosperous during the remaining days of your lives, and wherever you go or whatever you do I am sure you will have the love and confidence of every man who served with you in this House of Representatives. [Prolonged applause.] Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to proceed for five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I very heartily concur in all that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] had to say relative to the service of the three gentlemen to whom he has referred. Their retirement from Congress is a distinct loss to the House and also to the country.

I came to Congress 14 years ago with my warm personal friend, Tom Sisson, and have served with the exception of the first two years of our service on the same committee with him. I had heard of Tom Sisson before I came to Congress, because he had attended a great university in the district which I have the honor to represent and where he now has many warm personal friends of his schoolboy days.

After I came here and met him and served with him I formed a very warm attachment for him. In fact during my entire service of 14 years in this House there has been no Member with whom I have been on more intimate personal relationship than with Tom Sisson. I love him because of his big, pleasing personality and the cordial, generous good will he has for his fellow man. But something more than that is required to win the lasting affection and admiration of our associates in this House. A man must have ability, courage, and a keen sense of duty, and the gentleman from Mississippi possesses all of these in largest measure. No man was ever more faithful to public trust than Tom Sisson or more zealous in the performance of duty. In the consideration of public matters he never stopped to reflect what might be the effect on his own political fortune. He has always been true to his convictions and no people ever had a more faithful and earnest public servant, or one who more richly deserved their confidence.

As the gentleman from Illinois has said, he has saved millions of dollars to the people by reason of his service on the Committee on Appropriations. He has always been a forceful character upon the floor and in debate. No one has exercised a greater or more wholesome influence upon legislation to which he gave attention on the floor than he has. But after all, a man's work here can best be measured in committee rather than on the floor. I have served on the Committee on Appropriations with Tom Sisson for 12 years, and I know something of his devotion to the public interests, his industry, his great influence, and his desire to economize and to save the public money whenever it could be done without jeopardizing the best interest of the Government. No member of the Committee on Appropriations has done more to conserve the Public Treasury than he. Tom Sisson retires from Congress with the friendship and admiration and the love of every Member upon both sides of this Chamber. [Applause.] It is a real loss to have a man like him retire from public life, and whatever may be his personal inclinations, I sincerely hope that his great State of Mississippi will see to it that he reenters public life again. [Applause.] We need more men like Tom Sisson in public life. To me his retirement is a personal loss, for we have been intimately associated here and I count myself fortunate in having known and served with him. I join his colleagues in bidding him Godspeed in his every undertaking.

I have also served on the Committee on Appropriations with our good friend Will Stafford of Wisconsin, and I wish to indorse most heartily all the gentleman from Illinois has said with reference to his ability, his courage, and his industry. I suspect that in the course of his career here he has probably prevented the passage of many bills in which individual Members were interested, but no one has ever questioned his sincerity of purpose or his honesty and his desire to serve the public. [Applause.] Everyone knew that such objections as he has interposed were influenced solely by the fact that he felt that it was his duty as a Representative to protect the Treasury and the interest of the American people. His retirement is a great loss, and he will be missed in the deliberations of the next Congress. But, you know, he has had a habit of coming back. [Applause.] I hope if I stay here a year or two longer that I will sit again with him in this Chamber. [Applause.]

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] has not served on the Committee on Appropriations so long as other gentlemen to whom I have referred, but every Member of this House knows of the great ability which he has carried with him into that committee, and the earnestness and zeal and fidelity that he has manifested upon all occasions. I wish to repeat, Mr Chairman. that the retirement of these gentlemen is a public loss, a loss to the House, and a real personal loss to every Member of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes, out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. Chairman, I very heartily indorse all Mr. MONDELL. that has been said by the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Tennessee relative to these our colleagues who are leaving the House. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Husted] brought to the House a splendid personality and a trained mind, with habits of diligence and all of the qualities that make men useful here. He has been recognized as a faithful, conscientious, courageous legislator. He has in a large measure all those qualities, and has displayed all those qualities that make service here worth while. I very greatly regret that he has seen fit to end his services in the House, for the end of that service is a very great loss to the House

My friend, Tom Upron Sisson-well there are some of the folks that you not only highly regard for their good qualities as legislators, but that you get to have a kindly and friendly personal feeling for, entirely separate from your regard for Tom Sisson and I have been very good them as legislators. personal friends during all of our service. I like Tom Sisson, because he is a splendid fellow. I like him because he is a thoroughly consistent Democrat. [Applause.] I like him because in all of his public service he has had no other thought than the interest of the country and the welfare of the country. Not only has he been faithful and efficient, but he has possessed and exhibited a courage that has never failed, and God knows we need courage. [Applause.]

To my friend Will Stafford, it will be a long time before the House sees his like again, probably not until he returns [laughter and applause], which, in the interest of the country, will be soon. I hope. Some fellow may say under his breath, hope we will not have another just such fellow as our friend from Wisconsin." There have been times when I did not feel There have been times when I did not feel kindly disposed toward him. [Laughter.] There have been times when he has grieved me sorely. There have been times when there were very few of his colleagues, I fear, who felt There have been times kindly toward him for the moment, and yet he has performed a great work here, and I suggest to those of you who are remaining on both sides that it is high time that you had in training another Will Stafford. [Applause.] It is high time that on one side or the other—or better, on both sides—we shall develop a man who feels it his duty to guard the Public Treasury against the assaults of all, even of his best friends, who will undertake the thankless task of scrutinizing the Calendar for Unanimous Consent and the Private Calendar.

There have been Members of the House who have taken the view that Mr. Stafforn's activities in connection with the Private Calendar and the Calendar for Unanimous Consent were undertaken without due regard or consideration and without knowledge. I bear testimony to the fact—a fact with which I am well acquainted—that he has worked frequently long into the night reading reports, studying bills, looking up cases, doing the work of this House that no one else at the time seemed to have the courage or just the industry to do. Our friend from Wisconsin could have occupied his place in the House and, with his splendid qualifications, had a much happier time than he has had, if he had not felt called upon and if he had not been called upon by those in positions of responsibility to do work that no one else seemed to want to do. and yet work as essential and important as any ever performed in this Chamber. The best hope that I can have for the House from now on is that it shall have not only on one side but on both sides men who are as conscientious, men who are as earnest, men who are as courageous as WILL STAFFORD has been. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection. Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a country which is shortly to lose, at least temporarily, the services of the three gentlemen concerning whom my friends have just spoken can very well afford to have the body pause for a time in order that the appreciation of those of us who know them and know their work may be given voice. This body in showing them this honor but honors itself. These are not ordinary men who are leaving the service of the country. They are men who had trained minds when they came to the public service. They are men who day in and day out assiduously have applied themselves to putting into practice those principles of government in which they were so grounded before they came, and from day to day they have broadened and grown greater.

It was my good fortune during the first term that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] served in the Congress to be a member of the committee with him. It was not one of the major committees of the House but it was a committee that has important work to do. It was while serving on that Committee on Flood Control with him that I was first able to take the measure of the man. This highly educated gentleman, both academically and in the law, soon impressed himself upon all those with whom he came in contact as a man of extraordinary worth, extraordinary ability, and of magnificent courage. Since that time in more important committee service he has justified to the full all of the impressions that were then formed of him.

I also had the honor of service upon a special committee of the House with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford]. I had known of his service before, having observed his activities on the floor of the House, but of course in committee service, particularly with Members of the opposite political party, we always come to get a closer measure and are able better to estimate men than by the ordinary associations. That was a working committee upon which my friend Stafford and I served, and of all the workers on the committee I need not tell you that the most assiduous, the most persistent, was the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford]. [Applause.]

Of my friend from Mississippi, Tom Sisson, what shall I say? From the very beginning of his service we have been most intimate personal friends. There has never been a rift in our friendship. We may have differed upon some public questions, when I was wrong, but it has been very seldom that there has been such an occurrence. He is a man fundamentally sound, from the viewpoint of our political school, those of us sitting on the Democratic side, possessing the ability to expound views, learned in the political philosophy not only of the present day but of centuries past, always ready for debate.

Mr. Chairman, I shall end as I began. We but honor ourselves in honoring these men because of their ability, and, after all, I think that that which is greatest to us is the characteristics already referred to by other gentlemen who have preceded me, and that is the indomitable and unwavering courage of all three of these men. I remember to have read somewhere where the late Senator Daniel, of Virginia, was in attendance upon divine service. The minister in his prayer prayed that the public servants of the Government might have wisdom. At the conclusion of the service the Senator and the minister were walking away together when the Senator said, "May I venture upon a suggestion to you?" "Certainly," said the minister. "Then," said the Senator, "I suggest that it is not particularly necessary for you to pray that the public servants of the Government have wisdom. Most of us know enough. I suggest that you pray that we have courage." [Applause.]
Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, we of the Pacific coast and the intermountain States desire to indorse all that has been said concerning these hard-working, experienced, and long-tried retiring members of the Committee on Appropriations. I have asked for but a moment in which to pay a brief but earnest tribute to another retiring Member, who at this time is presiding as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill, the gentleman from Oregon, Mr. McArthur. [Applause.] He is known to everyone of us for his courage and fighting qualities, and yet none of us can say that the gentle-man from Oregon has ever been offensive on the floor or unnecessarily aggressive. Always has his courage been that of his conviction, and for that all admire him. Oregon is just across the great Columbia River from the district that I have the honor to represent, and I sometimes think that it is a sort of melting pot for legislation. If there is anything new in legislation from the referendum on up, they try it out in Oregon. [Laughter.]

And yet our friend McARTHUR, before his successes here, sat in the Legislature of Oregon with success, presided there, and handled the gavel as well as he has done here to-day, and always pursued a safe and sane course through a maize of trying propositions in Oregon, and in the House of Representatives here he has through his native courage seen fit to resist certain measures which to him, at least, seemed untimely. The only trouble seems to have been that, from the standpoint of popularity, at least, he took too many on at one time. As his neighbor, I saw him away out there in the beautiful city of Portland, oreg., fighting his campaign, maintaining his issues, almost single handed and saying, "Let all come on." I hope he will make the fight again and be with us once more in the House of Representatives. [Applause, the Members rising.]

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes at this point to take up the Hudspeth amendment, which was offered on page 42, which was passed over. The Chair has made careful search of the statutes and treaties and is unable to find any legislative authority which would warrant the consideration of the Hudspeth amendment, and therefore sustains the point of order which was made against the amendment. The treaties on this subject all deal with the right to fix the boundary line, but not with any right with respect to surveys and flood control or matters incident thereto.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. McARTHUR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 14480) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment; if not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Madden, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that for the remainder of the session the calendar may be printed in full dally, including the index. Under the law the index of the calendar is printed only on Monday. There is a considerable amount of legislation each day in one House or the other, and it is rather important, I think, that the Members be able to inform themselves relative to the status of legislation daily by reference to the calendar daily.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that for the remainder of the session the calendar be printed daily, including the index. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

THURSTON W. TRUE.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 2984, to insist on the House amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2984) for the relief of Thurston W. True.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And asks unanimous consent that the House insist on its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the conferees

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SNELL, Mr. KLECZKA, and Mr. CLARK of Florida,

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing in 8-point type a speech delivered in New York by ex-Gov. Charles N. Haskell, of Oklahoma, on the subject of government.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the speech delivered in the city of New York by former Governor Haskell, of Oklahoma. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

GOVERNMENT.

"Emerging from the centuries of monarchial government under which the submissive multitude were oppressed by the dominating few, there assembled in this part of the New World from all the countries of the Old World a sturdy class, willing to undergo the hardships and sacrifices of pioneer life that they might establish a government under which life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness might be assured and guaranteed unto them and their descendants, and presents the question, 'Whence and why government?' 'From the consent of the governed-for the welfare of the governed.

"And these two principles were to be assured for all time to come by the adoption of a constitution to be the guardian of these rights of the people and to provide reasonable regulation in the relations of man to man, limiting the interference with private rights to such invasion only as would be essential to public welfare, and this invasion of private rights to be equally limited in its interference with private business.

"After the most careful consideration, our Federal Constitution declares in substance: 'The duties and powers of the Federal Government shall be limited to the conduct of foreign relations, establishing uniform currency, general immigration laws, things incident to conduct of wars and defenses, preserving harmony among the States, providing general revenues for maintenance of the Federal Government,' emphatically limited to equitable taxation which positively, to be legal, must not be confiscatory; and these great duties of this character to be exercised by Congress, administered by the executive department, never contemplated a dissent to and interference with the people in administering local government with all its numerous provisions and requirements in the various States, and under the authority of the State in the various municipalities thereof.

"To emphasize these points and to assure the people against invasion of their rights and usurpation of legal authority by the Federal Government, jealous and determined to this end. 10 amendments to the original Constitution were provided concurrent with the ratification thereof by the States, and that there might be no misconstruction, based upon alleged implication to be derived from language, the tenth amendment thus provided says:

"'The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

"Can there be anything more emphatic? Only express authority gives power to the Federal Government, and all reserved and implied authority is emphatically vested in the State and its municipalities.

"This jealous protection of the rights of the individual is sustained by sound reason. The vast extent of our country, now divided into 48 States, contemplated a great variety of climate, with different classes of production, different climatic development of people of different desires and different necessities, realizing that what might please and make comfortable the people of the cold climate of Maine would not be agreeable to the people of sunny Louisiana.

"The wisdom, as well as the fairness, of our Constitution makers is clear to all of us. Realizing also that government, best created and best administered, is that government which preserves best, administers justice, and prevents oppression of one class upon another, has fully discharged its beneficial purposes and a minimum of invasion of local self-government and individual rights is the happy condition contemplated in our Federal Constitution and desired by our people, and while this Government was given the power of taxation, remember that the right to tax is the right to destroy, and therefore the Constitution emphatically said taxation should not be confis-

"Another guaranty of liberty was that expressed in the Constitution—in brief, 'religious liberty.' One of the emphatic demands of our people expressed in their Constitution was that every man might worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience. And time has demonstrated the wisdom of these several provisions, and for the years that our Constitution was held sacred and inviolate our country made the most wonderful progress ever recorded in the civilized That progress was not limited to added wealth alone nor to advanced education alone, but one of its most glorious products was the unwavering, unlimited patriotism of our people-their intense love of country that knew no parallel in any land, that affection for the Stars and Stripes that lead men facing death on the battle field in defense of that flag to exclaim in proudest tones, 'I am happy to die for my country.' That sentiment was one of the grandest products of firm constitutional government, and in our war of 1776, for freedom; 1812, to preserve that freedom; 1861, to preserve the union of States; 1898, that sympathetic war in behalf of our suffering neighbor; and the World War, recently waged for the preservation of the rights of peace-loving people throughout the world, there is no instance and no battle field of magnitude where every religious denomination did not have its men among our brave soldiers who died for public welfare and the flag. Does the original policy of our Government need any greater proof of proper spirit and intent?

"But to-day, unmistakably, we have developed such general usurpation of local authority by the Federal Government, such restriction of individual liberty, that the rights of the citizen and the conduct of private business are limited and embar-rassed by bureaucratic government which, unfortunately, is administered, no doubt, by well-meaning, but, unfortunately, in-experienced minds. Business, best created and most economically managed by scientific study and practical experience, is degenerating under the dictation of bureaucratic inexperience and gross lack of qualification. No benefit can result from this, for there can be no possible economy in cost of production or market values, no saving to the consumer, when production is restrained and economy destroyed by this unwarranted interference with competition and capability.

"Then if the conditions to-day need correcting, is there anything more advisable for us to do than to ask our great American Congress to return to the practical walks of life-sojurn among the masses of our people, read and profit by the guidepost, where the public highway crosses the railroad track and warns you to 'Stop, look, and listen!" Stop your invasion of individual liberty, look to the needs of your people, listen to the growing discontent of your people. And in doing this we shall pray to God that when you return to the exercise of your duties you will return to strict observance of the basic principles of the Constitution, first quoted. That you have wandered away into forbidden lands is apparent on every hand.

"This is not a warning to a Republican Congress, it is not a warning to a Democratic Congress; it is a light to both, an appeal for more consideration and less legislation.

"We as common people want to respect and look with pride upon the great American Congress without deriving the greater part of that pride out of your ancient history. We shall forever revere your past record, but we are equally anxious to respect your present doings. And when we speak of individual liberty we are mindful of the fact that individual liberty does not alone mean the right to think and act, but of equal consequence the right to preserve and enjoy the major part of the fruits of the individual's industry, and when you in the control of Government, from the school district up to the Halls of Congress, have grown so tremendously reckless in your public expenditures that the total created wealth from all crop product sources in our vast country will not equal your demand in any year—this year, or last, or the year before—have you not grossly violated the constitutional rights of the citizen when you, by direct or indirect methods, not only exhaust his entire created wealth, but have mortgaged his future for vast deficiencies?

"I have in mind but to-day a worthy citizen of one of the cities of our country—a growing city of approximately 600,000 people—who told me that they in their city had just completed the necessary provision for issuing $87,000,000 bonds for some necessary, some useful, and some ornamental creations.

"Is it possible that the authorities of that city realize that per capita upon the home, sheltering a father, a mother, and five children, this means a mortgage of $1,000 upon each such home, with its attendant interest charge and sinking fund added to the tax expenses and bonded indebtedness of that city? Can home comfort and prosperity come from any such governmental demands? I hope the time will come when the people of our country may realize that beauty of public structure is a secondary consideration; that charming, desirable public welfare lays in the comfort and happiness of the home, the place where you commune with your family, the place where you sleep and eat. Is it possible that that very origin of individual comfort and happiness must be ignored to the end that official extravagance may reach its unlimited privilege and ambition? We all look with admiration on public structures, but that view and that sensation is for the moment, and if measured in the balance, without appreciation of a home of comfort and happiness, must certainly be found wanting.

A good governmental policy should not mean bad results, unjust or unfair results. In this country of ours no one man nor class of men can comfortably and happily live independent of other classes. We have a community of interest. The producer, the great financier, the great transmission and transportation interests, the scientific, the professional, and the man of genius, each form their part in the essentials of comfortable and happy life unto all of the other elements. Each element being essential to the other, it must then be conceded that justice to all and partiality to none is the only correct governmental policy; human nature often requires moderating influence. It is only a temporary effect that one class may have unto itself the right to unjustly impose upon another class. Governmental policy that to-day makes it possible for one element to enjoy reckless extravagance when the price thereof must be drawn from another element of equal desert, and equal or greater industry, can but barely enjoy the absolute necessities of life.

"Ask the governmental authorities to learn the art of abolishing departments and offices not absolutely essential to public welfare; they already know the art of creating new ones.

"Let every voter emphasize the fact that under the consti-tutional guaranty of life and liberty the word "life" does not alone mean the privilege of breathing, but likewise fully embraces the right to enjoy life, to participate in the entertainments that add to the joys of life; that no man and no Government authority has a right to tell you that you shall not enjoy any reasonable privilege that does not unjustly invade public welfare.

INCOME TAX OF NONRESIDENT ALIENS.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 14050 and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the It is the same bill-

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14050) to amend the revenue act of 1921 in respect to income tax of nonresident allens.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 210 of the revenue act of 1921 is amended, to take effect January 1, 1922, to read as follows:

" NORMAL TAX.

"Sec. 210. (a) That in lieu of the tax imposed by section 210 of the revenue act of 1918 there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every individual (except as provided in subdivision (b) of this section) a normal tax of 8 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 216 except that in the case of a citizen or resident of the United States the rate upon the first $4,000 of such excess amount shall be 4 per cent.

in section 216 except that in the case of a citizen or resident of the United States the rate upon the first $4,000 of such excess amount shall be 4 per cent.

"(b) In lieu of the tax imposed by subdivision (a) there shall be levied, collected, and paid for the taxable year 1922 and each taxable year thereafter, upon the net income of every nonresident alien individual, a resident of a contiguous country, a normal tax equal to the sum of the following:

"(1) Four per cent of the amount of the net income attributable to compensation for labor or personal services performed in the United States in excess of the credits provided in subdivisions (d) and (e) of section 216; but the amount taxable at such 4 per cent rate shall not exceed $4,000; and

"(2) Eight per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the sum of (a) the amount taxed under paragraph (1) plus (b) the credits provided in section 216."

SEC. 2. That subdivision (e) of section 216 of the revenue act of 1921 is amended, to take effect January 1, 1922, to read as follows:

"(e) In the case of a nonresident alien individual, or of a citizen entitled to the benefits of section 262, the personal exemption shall be only $1,000. The credit provided in subdivision (d) shall not be allowed in the case of a nonresident alien individual unless he is a resident of a contiguous country, nor in the case of a citizen entitled to the benefits of section 262."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, just a word by way of

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, just a word by way of explanation of this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This bill might be said to be a bill for reciprocity with relation to the income tax with Canada. Our income tax, as every one knows, provides for only 4 per cent on the first $4,000 of income, and also provides for certain exemptions on account of dependents, and an exemption from the normal tax of $2,500. These exemptions, however, are not granted to nonresident aliens. Now, there are a number of people in Canada who are residents of Canada but who work on this side and receive income on this side and are subject to the payment of income tax. There are also about the same number of people who live in the United States who work in Canada who are subject to the Canadian income tax for the amount of their salary there. The Canadian law as it now stands grants to those who are residents of the United States and who perform work and labor in Canada the same exemptions it gives its own citizens, both with reference to dependents and the amount exempt from the normal tax. It also grants the same rate with reference to the tax on the first $4,000. In fact, the Canadian law is very similar to ours.

The purpose of this bill is to put the Canadians who come over on this side to work on an equality with the citizens of the United States who go over on the Canadian side to work.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.
Mr. CHINDBLOM. Can the gentleman state what is the exemption allowed by Canada?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Canada gives $300 exemption for each dependent

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And how much for the householder?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The exemption is not quite the same, but almost the same as it is here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 210 of the revenue act of 1921 is amended, to take effect January 1, 1922, to read as follows:

" NORMAL TAX.

"NORMAL TAX,

"Sec. 210. (a) That in lieu of the tax imposed by section 210 of the revenue act of 1918 there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every individual (except as provided in subdivision (b) of this section) a normal tax of 8 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 218 except that in the case of a citizen or resident of the United States the rate upon the first $4,000 of such excess amount shall be 4 per cent.

"(b) In lieu of the tax imposed by subdivision (a) there shall be levied, collected, and paid for the taxable year 1922 and each taxable year thereafter, upon the net income of every nonresident alien individual, a resident of a contiguous country, a normal tax equal to the sum of the following:

"(1) Four per cent of the amount of the net income attributable to compensation for labor or personal service performed in the United States in excess of the credits provided in subdivisions (d) and (e) of section 216; but the amount taxable at such 4 per cent rate shall not exceed $4,000; and

"(2) Eight per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the sum of (a) the amount taxed under paragraph (1) plus (b) the credits provided in section 216."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, there is a typographical error in the first line. A comma was omitted by the printer. I ask unanimous consent that on page 2, line 1, after the figures "216." a comma may be inserted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follow:

On page 1, line 2, after the figures "216," insert a comma.

the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, there is another clerical error. On page 2, line 4, the word "subdivision" is misspelled. I ask unanimous consent that it be corrected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Green of Iowa: Page 2, line 4, strike out the word "subdivison" as now spelled and insert the word "subdivision" correctly spelled.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Another typographical error, Mr. Speaker: On line 10, the word "four" should be a figure "4." These are all mistakes of the printer, I will say to the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, there is another typo-graphical error on line 16, page 2, where the word "eight" should be stricken out and the figure "8" inserted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Gegen of Iowa: In line 16, strike out the word "eight" and insert the figure "8."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what has been said by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Green] further than to say that this is a unanimous report from the committee. I will supplement what the gentleman from Iowa has said by stating that this applies to contiguous countries, and consequently Mexico as well as Canada is included in this bill. It is a unanimous report, and it is only right and proper that it should be passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That subdivision (e) of section 216 of the revenue act of 1921 is amended, to take effect January 1, 1922, to read as follows:

"(e) In the case of a nonresident alien individual, or of a citizen entitled to the benefits of section 262, the personal exemption shall be only $1,000. The credit provided in subdivision (d) shall not be allowed in the case of a nonresident alien individual unless he is a resident of a contiguous country, nor in the case of a citizen entitled to the benefits of section 262."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, there are two other clerical errors made by the printer. On line 17 of page 2 the small "a" in parenthesis should be a capital "A," and in line 18 the small "b" in parenthesis should be a capital "B."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendments suggested by the gentleman from Iowa will be made to the bill.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time,

was read the third time, and passed.

The large majority of addicts of all ages was reported as using morphine or opium or its preparations. * * * Most of the heroin addicts are comparatively young, a portion of them being boys and girls under the age of 20. Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not care to demand a second, but I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania one or two questions.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second. I propose to move to strike out the preamble.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania one or two questions. I understand this matter has been under consideration in the Committee on Foreign Affairs for several weeks.

Mr. PORTER. It has.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Hearings have been had upon it?

Mr. PORTER. Very extensive hearings.
Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And this was reported unanimously from the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. PORTER. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the resolution is so long that it is almost impossible to follow it. recites a number of facts which may be true and may not be true. It gives statistical data but we do not know the sources of these data. By incorporating the preamble we adopt in toto every statement in it. We are without copies of the resolution before us and I object to the manner of bringing it up and to voting on a resolution of this kind at this hour. I assume that the bill ought to pass, that the traffic should be restricted, if not altogether prohibited by civilized govern-

Mr. PORTER. The committee has made a very careful investigation of the facts as recited in the preamble and they are unquestionably correct. I might have read in my time a letter from the Secretary of State who has examined the resolution very carefully and recommends its passage, showing that not only the Committee on Foreign Affairs but the State Department approve of the statements of fact in the preamble. The object in retaining the preamble is that it will materially aid the President in the negotiation with the foreign govern-

Mr. LONDON. The State Department should be able to present the matter for action by other governments without the aid of Congress. There is no reason why we should have such a long preamble. The bill resembles a kite with its small body and its long tail. The preamble is too long. I do not object to the resolution. I am in sympathy with it.

I do not think the resolution should be brought up on the floor of the House at this late hour and at the very end of a long day's session. You have more than one suspension day.

understand the whole week is suspension week.

Mr. PORTER. This is the last opportunity that we will have to secure passage in the Senate. The object of the resolution is to give the President plenary power over the matter, so that when he speaks he speaks not only of the executive branch of the Government but for the legislative branch. This makes the position of the President very much stronger. Of course, the President could carry on the negotiations without any request from Congress, but you should bear in mind that the statesmen of Europe probably never fully realized the limitations upon the power of the President in the matter of the making of treaties until President Wilson failed to secure the ratifica-tion of the treaty of Versailles; therefore the passage of this resolution by Congress before negotiations are initiated will strongly impress upon the governments involved that the representations of the President reflect the views of both the executive and legislative branches of our Government.

Mr. LONDON. The adoption of this preamble would not eliminate the necessity of the Senate approving any treaty the President might enter into.

Mr. PORTER. No.
Mr. LONDON. There are so many violent fluctuations in the political life of the country that there is no knowing what may happen.

Mr. BLANTON. In this particular case the preamble is the main kite, the resolution is the tail.

Mr. LONDON. I am not opposed to this legislation; recognize that the opium traffic is one of the most disgraceful things in civilization, and every effort should be made not only things in civilization, and every enort should be made not only to repress it but to eliminate it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will permit, I think the chairman of our committee has stated the case with entire accuracy. I am sure that there is no mistake in the facts. I attended the hearings and heard what I characterized as the most wonderful testimony that I ever listened to as to the degradation to which men have been brought by this traffic. There is in the preamble a statement of facts and I assure my friends from Ohio and New York that there is not a single statement of fact in the preamble about which there is any dispute anywhere. They have simply stated the undisputed facts.

Mr. LONDON. Why is a special request to be made upon the Governments of Great Britain, Persia, and Turkey? Does the opium poppy grow only in these countries?

Mr. PORTER. The growth of the opium-producing poppy depends upon peculiarly favorable soil, which is especially found in small areas of India, Persia, Turkey, and China, and a very wet and hot climate until the capsule is formed; afterwards a very hot and dry climate during the flowering season.

With the exception of the opium produced in China, all the opium produced in the world results from the cultivation of between five and six hundred thousand acres of land in India, Persia, and Turkey. This confines the growing area to small acreage which makes control of production-unlike that of wheat or corn-practicable and comparatively easy of accomplishment; in fact the quantity produced in India has been for many years entirely controlled by the officials of the British India Government who administer the affairs of that possession.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 13, 1923.

Hon. STEPHEN G. PORTER,

House of Representatives.

House of Representatives.

Mx Dear Ma, Porter: I have read your letter of to-day's date and its accompanying resolution with much interest. The object which you have in view—that is, the restriction of the commercial cultivation of the optum poppy and the coca-leaf plant to quantities exclusively required for strictly medicinal and scientific purposes—is one with which I am in entire accord.

I can assure you of my deep interest in the work of narcotics control and of my willingness to forward in any way that I can the expressed views of the Congress on this important subject. I believe that the prompt passage of the proposed resolution, with the minor amendment suggested, will be an important aid in securing the desired result. If the commercial production of the raw plants from which opium products and cocaine are obtained can be minimized, the question of narcotics control will be greatly simplified. I shall be glad to place before your committee such information in regard to the narcotics-control question as is at my disposal.

I am, my dear Mr. Ponter, sincerely yours,

Charles E. Hughes.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, in addition to the indorsement by the Secretary of State, the passage of this resolution is strongly urged by the Mystic Order Veiled Prophets of the Enchanted Realm (the Grotto), who, speaking through their Grand Monarch, state:

* * I believe that it is therefore essential that we strike at the root of the evil and regulate the traffic in narcotic drugs at the source of production.

* The resolutions express the sentiments of nearly a half million Masons, with their families; * * * and in a telegram to your committee "the Grotto is expecting you to win and backs you to a man, and will do our part when called."

The Loyal Order of Moose, through Hon. James F. Davis, director general, says:

I want to present some 1,600 resolutions passed by the Loyal Order of Moose in support of House Resolution 430. * * The organization is now appropriating funds for the purpose of putting on a speaking campaign throughout the country, enlisting the services of men high in public life to present this subject to our 600,000 members. The Women's Mooseheart Legion. with a membership of 75,000, also indorses this resolution.

The duly authorized representatives of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, the American Red Cross, the Salvation Army, the State Council of Pennsylvania Order of Independent Americans, post organizations Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, and the Central Trades and Labor Council of New York also strongly indorse the resolution.

The American Insurance Union, representing 110,000 members, through its president, says:

Our national board unanimously indorses this resolution. * * * It is as much a disease to be stamped out as cholera or yellow fever or the bubonic plague.

The White Cross, an organization created for the purpose of suppressing the traffic on the Pacific coast, telegraphed your chairman, in part, as follows:

Your resolution dispensing for present with convention and short-circuiting the appeal to offending nations a worthy example of American diplomatic directness. * * Resolutions supported by White Cross with all our force.

The grand monarch of the M. O. V. P. E. R .- the Grotto-in a communication to the President, said:

"I feel that it is time, Mr. President, for the various fraternal organizations of our country to turn aside from their beaten paths of ritualistic ceremonies and give a little time and constructive thought to the ever growing needs of this and other nations of the world."

Many of the organizations mentioned evidently have adopted a similar policy, for it is indeed rare when they indorse pending legislation.

Rev. Edward C. Lobenstine, executive officer of the European and American missionary bodies in China, says:

The oplum traffic has been one of the serious hindrances to the work of the Christian church in China, inasmuch as one of the main arguments which we have for the spread of Christianity is our high ethical standards, and the feeling that it will improve the moral condition of the people, and yet in the eyes of the people in China the white race is morally responsible, directly responsible, for the introduction and the spread of the opium habit in China. * * Of course, I take it there is no use of speaking of the demoralizing influence of those using only.

If time permitted, many other indorsements from fraternal, church, and individual sources from all sections of the country could be enumerated, which plainly shows that the people of the United States are thoroughly aroused over the necessity of stamping out the addition to habit-forming narcotic drugs.

The resolution before the House (H. J. Res. 453) requests the President to urge upon the Governments of Great Britain, Persia, and Turkey the immediate necessity of limiting the growth -Papaver somniferum-and the production of opium and its derivatives exclusively to the amount actually required for strictly medicinal and scientific purposes, and also to urge upon the Republics of Peru and Bolivia and the Netherlands the immediate necessity of limiting the growth and production of coca leaves-Erythroxylum coca-and its derivatives to the quantity exclusively required for the same purposes.

Morphia, codeine, and heroin are obtained from opium, which is the coagulated juice of the opium-producing poppy. It is procured in paying quantities from the poppy cultivated in India, Persia, Turkey, and China. The growth of the plant depends upon peculiarly favorable soil, which is especially found in small areas of India, Persia, Turkey, and China, and a very wet and hot climate until the capsule is formed; afterwards a very hot and dry climate during the flowering season. With the exception of the opium produced in China, all the opium produced in the world results from the cultivation of between five and six hundred thousand acres of land in India, Persia, and Turkey. This confines the growing area to small acreage which makes control of production, unlike that of wheat or corn, practicable and comparatively easy of accomplishment; in fact, the quantity produced in India has been for many years entirely controlled by the officials of the British India Government who administer the affairs of that possession

About two-fifths of the oplum produced in India, Persia, and Turkey is retained for home consumption and the balance is exported to other countries where the morphia, codeine, and heroin are extracted by pharmaceutical chemists.

No effort had ever been made to extract these derivatives by pharmaceutical chemists in the Orient until about two years ago, when a laboratory for this purpose was established in Calcutta and one in the Japanese possession of Formosa.

Cocaine is obtained from coca leaves, which are indigenous to Peru, Bolivia, and the Netheralnds possession of Java, and the leaves likewise are exported to other countries where the cocaine is extracted. Recently, however, a laboratory was constructed in Peru for the extraction of crude cocaine, which is shipped to Europe for further refining.

Morphia and cocaine are indispensable in the treatment of certain diseases; the former for a century or more has been used almost exclusively for the alleviation of pain, both acute and chronic. They are universally used by the medical profession. It has often been said that without morphia the practice of medicine would be an unhappy calling, indeed. If the object of this resolution were achieved, their use would be restricted exclusively to these humane purposes, and continue to be the two greatest boons known to medical science.

The production of opium in India, Persia, and Turkey is approximately not less than 1,500 tons, of which but a comparatively small amount is required by the peoples of the world for strictly medicinal and scientific purposes. This quantity of 1,500 tons is exclusive of from 700 to 900 tons which is retained by these producing countries to meet the domestic demands of native addicts and for medicinal and scientific purposes. These native addicts consume the product by smoking and eating it. In 1919, according to the report of the British India Government, 741 tons of provision oplum was exported from India, and during the same year through the licensing of opium shops in India, the natives of that country consumed 531 tons of excise opium.

Statistical records and the evidence of the witnesses appearing before your committee place the world's consumption of opium for medicinal and scientific purposes to from 5 to 125 tons per year. The varying opinions of these witnesses prevent an accurate estimate of the amount actually required for these specific purposes, but assuming that the maximum amount of 125 tons is required to fulfill these strictly proper needs, the huge production of raw materials is greatly in excess of these requirements, thus releasing for immoral and illicit use approximately 1,350 tons per annum of provision or export opium. If the principle stated in the resolution were concurred in by the producing countries, these proper requirements could be determined through various sources, such as individuals, firms, and corporations duly authorized to dispense them, who are required a majority of the larger nations to keep an accurate record of the quantity so dispensed under severe penalty for infraction. The hospitals, sanitariums, penal and other institutions would also be very helpful in assisting in determining the amount actually needed for strictly medicinal and scientific purposes.

Even the opium producers of Turkey, Persia, and India can not, in truth, deny that the medicinal and scientific needs of the world is more than 250 tons per annum; therefore there would not be the slightest risk, so far as those requirements are concerned, in immediately reducing the production to that

This excessive overproduction in India is due to the fact that the administrative officials of that country offer inducements to the natives to engage in the production of the opium-producing poppy by lending them money without interest, the condition of the loan being that the entire crops shall be turned over to the Government at a price fixed by the Government, which derives large revenues from its indiscriminate sale to whomever will buy it at the highest price.

That portion of the product retained for domestic use is known as excise opium, and that intended for export as provision opium, which is largely disposed of in Calcutta at public auction each month, without restriction on its ultimate destination

It may be of interest to note that all the self-governing dominions of the British Empire-the Dominion of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and British South African colonies—have stringent antinarcotic laws similar to those in force in Great Britain, Japan, and the United States which require a physician's prescription before even a grain of opium or its derivatives can be purchased; nevertheless, a citizen of any of these self-governing dominions, in fact, a citizen of any country in the world, may journey to the Orient and buy unlimited quantities at auction in the British possessions of India or in the markets of Persia and Turkey.

In strong governments, or wherever self-government exists, habit-forming narcotic drugs are outlawed, except for strictly medicinal and scientific purposes. The failure of certain European nations and Japan to give by law to the people living within their possessions the same protection against these drugs that they give to their own citizens, through antinarcotic drug laws, is largely responsible for the present deplorable conditions, notwithstanding the fact that reliable authorities agree that the oriental suffers the same harmful effects as the occidental from the use of habit-forming narcotic drugs. Professor Cushney, the eminent pharmacologist of the University of Edinburgh, has given his opinion that he is aware of no evidence to prove that orientals have a different reaction to drugs from occidentals, and that until such evidence is brought forward he is not prepared to accept it.

The production of coca leaves-from which cocaine is extracted-in Peru, Bolivia, and the Netherlands possession of Java, is likewise vastly in excess of the quantity required from which an adequate supply of cocaine for medicinal and scientific purposes could be obtained.

The overgrowth and resultant overproduction of the opiumproducing poppy and coca leaves make possible vast quantities reaching the hands of unscrupulous traffickers, who, by reason of the smallness of bulk of these products and the large financial gains obtained from their illicit handling, easily transport, with minimum risk of detection, and are enabled to smuggle large quantities of morphia, codeine, heroin, and cocaine into the United States, which prohibits their importation, and other countries where they are disposed of to those who engage in the nefarious trade of selling them to the unfortunates who have become addicted to their use.

It should be of interest to know that $5,000 worth of morphia, codeine, heroin, or cocaine may be safely concealed in an ordinary suitcase; that in a hollow cane of average thickness $2,000 worth may be secreted. It was stated in your committee that on a steamer crossing the Pacific some one happened to examine a particular bamboo chair and found that its hollow bamboo was filled with morphia.

The sundry and varied manners and forms in which traffickers ply their illicit trade would prove interesting reading and be striking evidence of the ease with which the drugs are transported from country to country. The vender of them finds it comparatively easy to bring his goods into the United States through our extensive seacoasts and immense boundaries. Even our penitentiaries and jails are invaded by the traffickers, within their walls market for these vicious drugs, payment for which is made by the prisoners issuing I O U's to friends on the outside.

The testimony conclusively shows that habit-forming narcotic drugs, by reason of their extraordinary nature, will overcome all barriers, even the bars of prisons, or, as stated by Sir John Jordan, the noted British authority on the subject and member of the opium Advisory Commission appointed by the council of the League of Nations, "Whenever and wherever opium is produced, it will reach the consumer." This shows the futility of attempting to control the traffic by even the most drastic of domestic laws, which is further confirmed by the statement of

Mr. Blanchard, of the Narcotic Division of the Treasury Department, who testified that of all the drugs seized last year in the United States between 75 per cent and 85 per cent bore the labels of foreign manufacturers. Therefore the purposes of the Harrison Antinarcotics Act, the Jones-Miller Act, and the prohibition against the importation of these alkaloids have been substantially defeated, as they have not prevented smugglers and peddlers from keeping the supply of these drugs in the United States undiminished.

As to the number of addicts in the United States, I quote the following extract from the report, dated April 15, 1919, of the special committee of investigation of traffic in narcotic drugs appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury:

The committee is of the opinion that the total number of addicts in this country probably exceeds 1,000,000 at the present time. * * * The range of ages of addicts was reported as from 12 to 75 years. The large majority of addicts of all ages was reported as using morphine or opium or its preparations. * * Most of the heroin addicts are comparatively young, a portion of them being boys and girls under the age of 20. This is also true of cocaine addicts.

This report took into full consideration and made allowance for the lack of laws making compulsory registration of drug addicts, the secrecy connected with the unlawful sale and use of these drugs, and the other difficulties in obtaining information which would give the exact number of addicts in the United States.

Valuable evidence in this respect has been submitted to your committee by hospital and penal institution officials, physicians, sociological workers, fraternal organizations, such as the Velled Prophets of the Enchanted Realm (the Grotto), Loyal Order of Moose, Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, the Salvation Army, and public health organizations, as well as private individuals who have carefully studied the habit-forming drugs problem and who are well qualified to express opinions on the subject, which not only confirms the statement in the report above quoted but makes it evident that conditions in the United States resulting from the increasing and spreading use of these drugs by addicts are constantly growing worse.

The number of addicts committed to our penal establishments and admitted to sanitariums is rapidly increasing. The warden of the Federal prison at Leavenworth reports that from July, 1914, to December 31, 1922, 7 per cent of the prisoners committed were drug addicts. During 1921 151 per cent were addicts. From July 1 to December 31, 1922, 24 per cent The warden of the Federal prison at Atlanta were addicts. reports for the fiscal years 1918, 11 per cent addicts; 1919, 6 per cent addicts; 1920, 8 per cent addicts; 1921, 15 per cent addicts; 1922, 20 per cent addicts.

Dr. Amos O. Squire, chief physician of Sing Sing Prison, New York, testified that since 1919, comparing it with the year ending June, 1922, shows an increase of 900 per cent, and that 90 per cent of the drugs were obtained from peddlers.

The foregoing only confirms the statements of the witnesses that much of the crime committed is traced to addicts in their frenzy to obtain money with which to buy the drugs

The depredations wrought upon humanity by the demoralizing effects of these drugs have been fully and convincingly stated by witnesses who have described the misery and suffering of those who have acquired their immoral use and who are abandoning themselves to increasing indulgence in them. Young boys and girls are being seduced from good citizenship by the lure of dangerous narcotics which rapidly sap and ultimately destroy their moral and physical sensibilities and instinctive refinements. Even a child born to an addict mother becomes addicted through the mother's milk.

The testimony further discloses that the principal causes of addiction are: Unskilled medical treatment, recklessness of youth, the use of the drugs as a relief from acute and chronic pain by persons ignorant of their habit-forming nature, and solicitation by peddlers.

The accepted treatment is known as "tapering-off"-that is, the gradual reduction of the amount used until the patient is able to abstain from its use-but this is a long and tedious treatment requiring strict surveillance of the patients long after they have left the hospital or sanitarium, and, as stated by the representative of the Salvation Army, the peddler, who has temporarily lost a customer, usually persuades his physically weakened victim to renew the drug habit.

Complete recoveries are few and the phrase "once an addict always an addict" in its essence is literally true.

Addicts are the victims of misfortune over which but few of them have had any control, as addiction rarely occurs through viciousness except in the cases of habitues of the so-called "underworld," and perhaps many of these have been reduced to this social condition as the result of addiction. They are the most grateful of patients, and frequently commit minor offenses so that they may be committed to an institution in the hope of being cured of their affliction.

Mr. Crim, Assistant Attorney General, stated:

"We have cases where these men call up and say: 'I am a drug addict. I am going to sell some opium down on the corner of such and such a street at such and such an hour, and if you will go there you can apprehend me. I want to go to jall. I am afraid of myseif.'"

They are not admitted to hospitals because their craving for the drug renders them beyond control. They are frequently the victims of nostrums and quack sanitariums, and should be the objects of compassion rather than be termed as "dope fiends."

I trust the day is not far distant when the necessity for constructing and maintaining an institution for the treatment and care of these unfortunate people is recognized, which would result in many being cured of the affliction.

There is an economic aspect to this problem about which I hesitatingly make reference, but, inasmuch as we are living in a highly commercial period, perhaps it is better to do so.

According to the report of the special committee heretofore referred to, satisfaction of addiction to the drug habit entails a useless annual expenditure of approximately $61,000,000 for habit-forming drugs, and the report further states that at least 25 per cent of the addicts are not occupied in gainful occupations which would represent on a conservative estimate a loss of $150,000,000 annually. Continuing, the report says:

These figures do not include the cost of drug addiction to individuals as a result of loss from theft, burglary, and other crimes, nor the cost to the States and municipalities in the suppression and punishment of crime and the care and treatment of those who eventually become a charge upon the community.

In addition to these items, the Federal Government appropriated $750,000 last year for the enforcement of antinarcotic laws, which is found to be wholly inadequate.

Treaties between countries have not availed in restricting traffic in these drugs, especially the treaty resulting from the meeting of the international opium commission at Shanghai, China, in 1909, and the conferences at The Hague in 1911 and 1912. The failure of this treaty was made possible by the fact that instead of placing limitation upon production, attempt was made to regulate the traffic in habit-forming narcotic drugs by restricting their transportation and sale. Evasion of this restriction is easily accomplished by reason of the fact, as already stated, that illicit traffic through surreptitious channels and sources is readily and safely engaged in, the drugs finding a waiting and eager market everywhere.

The treaty is also extremely indefinite and encourages evasions which can readily be seen by the wording of article 7, which is as follows:

Contracting powers shall prohibit the importation and exportation of prepared opium. However, those nations which are not yet ready to prohibit the exportation of prepared opium at once shall prohibit such exportation as soon as possible.

The treaty will, however, be beneficial in one respect. Many of the contracting powers have passed antinarcotic laws in pursuance of the treaty which will be very helpful hereafter in estimating the quantity of these drugs actually needed for strictly medicinal and scientific purposes.

Under article 23 of the treaty of Versailles the execution of the treaty of The Hague was delegated to the League of Nations, the council of which appointed an opium advisory committee of nine, representing certain nations, and three advisers or assessors who were appointed by the council irrespective of nationality. These were Sir John Jordan, M. Henri Brenier, and Mrs. Hamilton Wright.

At the meeting held in June, 1921, upon motion of Mr. Wellington Koo, the Chinese representative on the opium advisory committee, a resolution was adopted recommending the reduction and restriction of the cultivation of the poppy and the production of opium therefrom to strictly medicinal and scientific purposes.

The Koo resolution was ratified by the council of the League of Nations, which recommended its adoption by the assembly of the League. The assembly is composed of a representative from each nation which is a member of the League of Nations.

At the meeting of the assembly of the League held on October 19, 1921, the assembly recommended that the words "strictly medicinal and scientific" be stricken out and the word "legitimate" be substituted in lieu thereof on the statement of the Indian delegate, Mr. Sastri, "that the Indian population is throughout vast areas without adequate medical assistance, and therefore habitually takes opium in small doses as a prophylactic or as an effective remedy against diseases with which some of these regions are constantly infected."

The uses of opium enumerated by Mr. Sastri in his argument in favor of the amendment are clearly medicinal, and therefore there was no necessity for the amendment; further, anyone of average intelligence knows that opium is not a prophylactic or preventive of any disease, especially the fevers which occur in tropical countries. Mr. Sastri's statement that the "small doses" habitually taken by the people of India, according to the official record of the Indian government, consumed 532 tons of opium in 1919, and should arouse curiosity as to how much, in his opinion, a large does would be. It is perfectly obvious that the striking out of the words "strictly medicinal and scientific" and the substitution in lieu thereof of the general word "legitimate" was intended to legitimatize and thereby continue to encourage the sale of large quantities of this drug without restrictions on its use, which is "legitimate" in the oriental possessions of many European countries, and thereby preserve the large revenues which the opium-producing countries derive from its production and the opium-producing countries are production. tries derive from its production and sale.

Mrs. Hamilton Wright, of the United States, one of the advisers and assessors of the opium advisory commission of the League of Nations, suggests the following in connection with the amendment:

If the eating of opium is legitimate, it must follow that its cultivation is legitimate. If it is legitimate for the Indian to consume opium, why not the Chinese? And, to go a step farther, if it is a legitimate thing for the oriental, why not for the occidental? * * * If opium is a good thing, why are there any regulations at all? But if it is an evil thing real regulation means suppression or restriction of cultivation to its legitimate medicinal need.

This perfidious action of the assembly of the league in legitimatizing and encouraging for the sake of revenue the traffic in opium destroys all hope of relief from this international scourge through the League of Nations.

That our country has always pursued a program, without regard to revenue, designed to suppress the illicit traffic in habit-forming narcotic drugs, not only in continental United States but in other countries as well which have suffered from the ravages of these insidious agencies of human destruction, is fully evident in its sympathetic cooperation with the efforts of the Government of China in dealing with the opium problem in that country and in suppressing and prohibiting drug traffic in the Philippine Islands immediately apon its acquisition of that territory

This conclusion is fully justified by the terms of the treaties with China of November 17, 1880, and October 18, 1903, the treaty of May 22, 1882, with Korea, and the treaty of July 29, with Japan, in all of which it was agreed that citizens of the United States shall not be permitted to import opium into these countries or buy or sell any opium therein. enforcement of these treaties by the Government of the United States against its own citizens accounts, in part, for the high esteem and respect which the people of China and Korea have always held for the people of the United States.

It is a maxim of law that "he who goes into equity must do so with clean hands," and we should be proud to say that our Republic enters upon this extraordinary undertaking with clean hands in harmony with its traditional policy

The President is not requested in this resolution to make representations to China for reasons which are perfectly plain to anyone familiar with the pathetic struggle of two centuries which that country has made to protect her people from the ravages of opium. The principle of limitation of production to medicinal and scientific purposes has long been advocated by China; therefore it is not necessary to ask China to agree to a principle which she has already approved.

The growth, cultivation, and production of the opium-producing poppy in India is controlled by the British Government in India by virtue of its sovereignty over that possession, and the Kingdom of Persia and the Empire of Turkey, in the exercise of their sovereignty, can place restrictions and limitations upon the growth and production of the poppy within and exportation from their respective countries.

Likewise, by reason of their sovereign powers, the Republics of Peru and Bolivia and the Netherlands, in the case of Java, can restrict and limit production within and exportation from their respective countries of cocaine and the raw product-coca leaves-from which cocaine is made.

It is true that the adoption of the principle stated in the resolution, namely, that the production of these habit-forming narcotic drugs only to the extent needed for strictly medicinal and scientific purposes will decrease by from 10 per cent to 20 per cent the revenues of Persia, Turkey, and India, but surely the agonizing cries of the millions of sufferers from addiction to these drugs during the last two centuries should have more weight than these revenues, and the moral forces of the world should place America's unselfish plea for humanity above the dollar, the incalculable benefits from which will inure to all the peoples of the world to exactly the same extent that they would inure to the people of the United States.

In summarizing, the hearings conclusively show:

That these habit-forming drugs are indispensable to proper medication of the people of the world.

2. That the enormous overproduction is being used for vicious purposes and causing irreparable injury to hundreds of thousands of people.

3. That by reason of the extremely limited area on which opium can be produced in paying quantities it is entirely practicable to control production thereof through the exercise of the sovereignty of the governments of the people which pro-

4. That the amount needed for medicinal purposes is comparatively easy of ascertaining.

That all laws and treaties founded on the principle of controlling and restricting the use of these drugs to proper purposes by controlling the sale and transportation thereof have utterly failed, and in some instances may have tended to encourage their barter and sale.

6. That by reason of their extraordinary nature an extraordinary remedy must be applied, namely, the limitation of production to the amount needed for strictly medicinal and scientific purposes.

It is the duty of the United States of America to take the lead in this movement for the benefit of humanity as it has done many times before, so that, as stated in the splendid editorial of the New York Times, the President will be taking out of the hands of hundreds of thousands in our own country alone habit-forming narcotic drugs which De Quincey spoke of as having the "keys of Paradise, but which opens at last the doors to perdition.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. PORTER. Certainly.

Mr. CHALMERS. I just wanted to say that I am not opposed to this legislation but that I am in favor of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution, including the preamble.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the joint resolution was passed.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

By unanimous consent, leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD was granted to-

Mr. Porter, Mr. Siegel, Mr. Mondell, Mr. Collier (and to print in connection therewith certain resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi upon the soldier question), Mr. Greene of Vermont, and Mr. Ackerman.

The extensions of remarks referred to are here printed in full

as follows

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, it is now evident that Congress will be unable to act on relieving the hardships caused by the present 3 per cent quota law, and, retiring as I do from this House after eight years of service as a member of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, I feel it my duty to express what I believe is the problem which the Immigration Committee has been trying to solve. We must at the outset realize that the United States to-day has living under our flag and outside of the continental area itself approximately a population of 108,710,620 in the 48 States of the Union. That in addition thereto we have over 13,000,000 of people living under our flag outside of the continental area.

OUR ACCOMPLISHMENTS SINCE 1890.

The committee having adopted the 1890 census as a basis of calculations, because it is claimed that the newer immigration was a detriment instead of a benefit, it is interesting to learn what we have achieved since 1890. As a result of our entering the Cuban war and later acquiring the Virgin Islands, a new era has come in all the West Indies. We have become a power in the affairs of the Pacific, having taken Guam and the Hawaiian Islands. To-day we have under us the Philippines; we helped to bring to an end the conflict between Russia and Japan, and by the holding of the recent conference in Washington have temporarily at least brought peace in the Pacific, We gave up the Chinese indemnity. We created the Panama Canal, and when the European Great World War seemed destined to terminate in favor of Germany, we went into the struggle with all of our resources of man power and material wealth and strength so that the Allies came out victorious. To-day we are To-day we are the only power on the face of the earth which is not threatened by war and fears no one. Such is the story of the United States since 1890 with its increase of more than 35,000,000 of population. During the same time that newer immigration was coming here, illiteracy has constantly and steadily decreased wherever the immigrants have settled. The statistics of the census of 1920 show this. In its bulletin issued October 12. 1921, it stated:

That the illiterate population of the United States, 10 years of age and over, numbered 4,931,905 in 1920, as against 5,516,163 in 1910, 6,180,069 in 1900, 6,324,702 in 1890, and 6,239,958 in 1880. The illiterate population represented 6 per cent of the total 10 years of age and over in 1920, the corresponding percentages for the last four preceding census years being 7.7 in 1910, 10.7 in 1900, 13.3 in 1890, and 17 in 1880. The term "illiterate" as used by the Census Bureau signifies inability to write in any language, not necessarily English, In general, the illiterate class comprises only those persons who have had no schooling whatever.

LOYALTY AND DEVOTION OF THE ALIEN DURING THE WORLD WAR.

The official report of The Adjutant General of the Army shows that 415,000 of the aliens in the United States waived exemption and entered our armies and fought most gallantly during the recent struggle. As a Member of Congress I helped pass a law by which these men, although most of them were in the United States less than five years, were to obtain, and they did receive, American citizenship.

To the story of the hero the military historian add the postscript:

"Abraham Krotoshinsky is a small, shy, emaciated youth, with large limpid blue eyes set far apart in a face which suffering and privatiom have pinched very close to the contour of his skull. He has been for six years in the United States, which include the service of Uncla Sam. Although he wears on the lapel of his coat the red and blue

'When General Pershing himself gave me my cross he told me I should try to be a good citizen; that that was as much as to be a good soldier. And now'—this this insistent interruption as others would have him more elaborate the story of daring and glory—'now won't you please tell me how I can, quick, get my citizen papers.'"

Everyone knows the story of the Seventy-seventh Division, and how it was composed of all the nationalities and creeds which make up the so-called lower and upper East Side of New This is what Major General Alexander, who was its commander, has written:

It contained in its ranks representatives of all who have here sought freedom and citizenship under the flag. Fully represented was the Jewish race. My heart swells with pride that I was their commander. I am thrilled to think of the fact that the principles of Americanism and the principles of loyalty to our country can so animate human nature as to carry on through their trials and their dangers and their decimation.

Further proof, if any be required as to who did his full duty in the Great World War, can be found in the article published in Collier's, entitled:

EIGHT AMERICAN SOLDIERS. (By Samuel McCoy.)

In Collier's, entitled:

(By Samuel McCoy.)

The heroism of the eight Americans whom I am about to name was duplicated in every one of the hundreds of regiments which were sent from America to serve in France. I name these eight men merely because their war records happen to be before me at the moment and because much has been said of late in regard to the proper qualifications for American citizenship.

Each of these men was awarded the distinguished service cross. Twenty thousand men who fought in the same division to which they beloaged all acquitted themselves with henor in the face of danger. A thousand men of the division were singled out to happen the commission. But see eight were ranked even higher than all these. They were of the handful who won the distinguished service cross—a decoration awarded only "for extraordinary heroism in action."

The first man, a sergeant, in the assault launched against the seemingly impregnable Hindenburg line, "although twice wounded, refused to leave the field, but remained with his platoon, exhibiting magnificent courage and bravery, until he was wounded a third time. Mr. Speaker, there has been constant reiteration in the press and other places that in the States where the foreign-born population has settled in great numbers that they and their descendants had not given the proportionate number of men during the great World War. WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, February 16, 1923.

Enlisted men.

Washington, February 16, 1928.

Hon. ISAAC SIEGEL,
House of Representatives.

My DEAR MR. SIEGEL: In response to your letter of the 15th instant, in which you request to be furnished with statistical information showing, by States, the total number of officers and enlisted men who served in the United States Army during the World War, I have the honor to advise you as follows:

Accurate and complete statistics on the World War are not yet available for publication. Final statistics showing, by States, the number of men furnished to the Army during that war will not become available until this office shall have completed its task of furnishing to the adjutant general of each State a detailed statement of the military service of every man from that State who served in the Army during the war. The following tabulation shows the number of statements of service thus far prepared in the cases of men who served during the war as enlisted men from the various States and Territories:

AMERICAN-BORN BOYS WILL NOT DO THE COMMON LABOR.

The United States Bureau of Education in its Bulletin No. 29 for 1922 calls attention to the fact that there are 19,378,927 elementary and kindergarten pupils in the United States, and that at the same time there were 2,199,389 boys and girls attending secondary and high schools. Of the 2,199,389 secondary or high-school pupils, the number of males is 992,213 and the number of girls is 1,207,176.

We are constantly being asked by business men, manufacturers, and others interested in the welfare of the Republic as to why it is that the American boy and girl will not do any of the rough work which in times gone by was performed by the arriving immigrants. The answer is a very brief one. The American-born boy and girl are opposed to doing what is ordinarily known as common labor unless it is a means to an end, such as completing an engineering education, and so forth. With the exception of the textile public high school in New York, which is a free institution, and the textile school at Philadelphia, no other school exists in this country for the teaching of textiles to the high-school boys and girls. No wonder that so few high-school boys and girls are willing to enter such fields of labor or business. As a matter of fact, it matters very little what the amount of pay is offered.

The boy and girl attending high school have made up their minds that they are going to be professional people, if possible. They would rather be clerks, stenographers, and salesmen than be milliners, dressmakers, or tailors. It is startling to learn from the testimony given before our committee how few are now entering the trades for the purpose of undergoing an apprenticeship. It is time for the American people to awaken to the realization that something must be done promptly to point out to the rising generation that manual or physical labor does not demean or lower one in the estimation of the public at large. With the desire of the American people not to have as large an immigration as in the past, it is absolutely essential and necessary that these facts be brought home to all who are interested in seeing this country continue to make

My dear colleague on the committee [Mr. RAKER, of California] has repeatedly asked the question which I have propounded, and has taken the opposite view to mine. I believe that he will be interested in the following newspaper article, which appeared in the New York Times on February 15, 1923:

FINDS EDUCATION WASTED—CALIFORNIA PROFESSOR RECOMMENDS FICK AND FRYING PAN FOR STUDENTS.

Berkeley, Calif., February 14.—Facing a class of both sexes, Prof. C. L. Montgomery, of the English department, declared that there were 7,000 students in the University of California "who should be attached to the handle of a pick or a frying pan."

Seventy per cent of the university's 10,000 students, he said yesterday, were more interested in dancing than in pursuing the subtletles of Shakespeare or Chaucer.

OLD IMMIGRATION PRODUCED THE SLACKERS DURING THE WAR.

The proponents of quota immigration legislation call attention all the time to the desirability of the so-called old immigration, specifically pointing out Sweden, Norway, Holland, Switzerland, and Denmark. It may startle them to learn that out of a total number of 1,692 aliens who withdrew their declarations of intention in order to avoid military service during the late war 788 came from Sweden, 479 from Norway, 111 from Holland, 158 from Switzerland, and 68 from Denmark. Few came from the new immigration. I read a letter received from Mr. Post, Assistant Secretary of Labor, dated October 21, 1919, which is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
Washington, October 21, 1919.

My Dear Mr. Kleczka: I have to refer to my letter to you of the 16th instant, transmitting a table concerning aliens who withdrew their declarations of intention to become citizens of the United States for the purpose of avoiding military service in the Armies of the United States. Since sending you that table the records have been reexamined, and it has been found that a number of the cases included in the previous list did not properly fall within the terms of the act of July 9, 1918, which provided for the exemption from military service of neutral allens who having made declarations surrendered them and elected to be debarred from citizenship for the purpose of avoiding the draft. A new table has, therefore, been prepared and brought down to date. A copy of the revised table is inclosed herewith. Among the changes you will note that nationals who were not neutral in the present war have been eliminated.

Respectfully yours,

Louis F. Post, Assistant Secretary.

Hon. John C. Kleczka,
Representative in Congress, Washington, D. C.

NATIVE BORN ARE LEADERS IN OUR RECENT DISORDERS.

Who are responsible for the recent disorders in this country? The troubles in Louisiana, which showed the most barbarous, cruel, and inhuman treatment ever accorded to human beings, was the work of the Ku-Klux Klan, ostensibly composed of native-born Americans. The murderers in Herrin, Ill., who committed wholesale murder, which crime shocked the country, were native-born Americans. Lynching of white union railroad men at Harrison, Ark., was the work of native-born Americans. The Supreme Court of the United States has by its order last week determined that a question of fact is presented for the District Court of the United States of Arkansas whether the negroes convicted of murder were actually guilty of it. If the affidavits presented to the United States Supreme Court on the application are taken and weighed very carefully, the mob controlled the courts of Arkansas. This mob was composed of native-born Americans. Who were the leaders of the great disorders—Foster, Haywood, and McNamara. All born here. There is not a single case of an alien being a lyncher. I am alluding to these facts, because constantly and continuously there is being drummed into the minds of the American people the erroneous impression that the immigrant or his descendants are to blame for industrial strife and are the fomenters of trouble. Careful investigation shows that in cities like Washington, D. C., where the population to a very large extent is native born, that the proportionate share of crime is greater than in cities like New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, and so forth.

NATURALIZATION IS HINDERED AND DELAYED FOR THE FAILURE TO PROVIDE COURTS AND CLERKS.

Repeated attention has been called by the entire membership of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization to the fact that there is an insufficiency of courts and clerks in the big cities of the country, such as New York, Chicago, etc., so that applicants for naturalization find themselves in the position that considerable money must be spent and time wasted, not only of their own, but of witnesses. Certain statistics fur-nished by the Department of Labor which follow demonstrate this statement beyond contradiction. It will be noticed that the three six-month periods from July 1 to December 31, show the falling off at New York. This is accounted for by the fact that on account of the congested business in the United States district court and the lack of Federal judges, it became impossible to handle the naturalization work. The Supreme Court of New York finds itself with 27,000 cases which have to be tried, and, therefore, can not give the necessary time to look after naturalization proceedings. The only remedy which can cure these evils and their growing is the establishment of a separate naturalization court in each of the big cities of the country. It would more than pay for itself, and at the same time bring into the Treasury at least $300,000 per year after the payment of all expenses.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE ADMISSION OF PREBLE-MINDED.

Although favoring a fair and liberal immigration law, I have been unalterably and irrevocably opposed to the admission to the United States of any individual who has not been physically, mentally, and morally fit. I am opposed to the admission of any person who can not or will not comply with our laws. No better immigration act than the act of 1917 will ever be written by any Congress. The Public Health Service is not responsible for the admission of any feeble-minded or insane. responsibility rests on Congress. Its failure to appropriate sufficient money to have a sufficient number of competent, expert, and able alienists at the ports of arrival to examine immigrants is at the bottom of the trouble. The time has come for very plain talk in regard to this subject, and it is useless for Members of the House to be criticizing the Public Health Service when the responsibility is its own. The biggest mistake which has been made is to have the money which is collected from head taxes paid into the Treasury instead of being kept as a separate fund.

EMPLOYEES AT ELLIS ISLAND DISCRIMINATED AGAINST AND TREATED UNPAIRLY.

It is a very well known fact that the employees at Ellis Island working in the Immigration Service have been compelled to work seven days a week at times, and frequently have to work over hours, including Sundays and holidays. At times, on account of lack of appropriations, many of these employees, although in the service for more than 15 and 20 years, having families, including children who have to go to school, have been furloughed without pay for many months. While this state of affairs is permitted to prevail in the Immigration Service, customs employees are permitted, and wisely so, to be paid for extra hours. This has been the subject of correspondence between Secretary Davis and members of the Immigration Committee. I deem it vitally important that Congress should know the facts, so that when the Sixty-eighth Congress meets it may do justice to these hard and conscientious workers in the Government employ. The correspondence to which I have alluded is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF LIABOR, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY, Washington, February 19, 1923.

Washington, February 19, 1923.

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SIEGEL: In reply to your letter of February 16, I inclose one addressed to Hon. Albert Johnson, chairman of the Immigration Committee of the House of Representatives, on January 2.

Why should the employees of one department be preferred over those of another in the matter of compensation for additional service. Cordially yours,

JAMES J. DAVIS.

JANUARY 2, 1923.

Hon. Albert Johnson,

Chairman Committee on Immigration and Naturalization,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Congressman: I referred your letter of December 16 to the Commissioner General of Immigration, who has submitted to me the following memorandum:

"Referring to Congressman Johnson's bill (H. R. 1330) entitled 'A bill to facilitate commerce by prescribing overtime rates to be paid by transportation lines for inspection of arriving passengers and crews,' I beg to say that the bureau favors the proposed legislation.

"Congress has already enacted legislation under which officers and employees of the Customs Service receive compensation for overtime work from steamship companies, which companies, it is understood, are entirely willing to pay for such extra service in order to avoid long delay in landing passengers and their baggage. So long as such overtime service is rendered by customs officers it is, of course, necessary that immigration officers shall do likewise, and the fact that the latter receive no extra compensation for such work, while officers of another service are liberally rewarded, naturally results in dissatisfaction. Indeed, it seems to me that the unfairness of such an agreement is too obvious to require any particular comment.

"Our boarding officers at New York have repeatedly complained about the existing discrimination, and I found the same spirit of dissatisfaction at Seattle and San Francisco. Officers on the two borders are compelled frequently to work long hours of overtime when trains are delayed and they also feel that they are entitled to overtime pay, particularly when customs officers working on similar shifts with them are given extra compensation for overtime work performed.

"There is attached hereto copy of a statement relative to the work of the board division at New York, transmitted to the bureau by Commissioner Tod. You will note from the attached statement that the greatest amount of overtime work in a single day was performed on July 1 of the present year, this being the day on which the quotas for the new fiscal year were opened. The showing, of course, is not representative of normal conditions at the port of New York, but it will be noted that there was considerable overtime work during the remaining days of the month when the so-called quota rush was over.

"It has been suggested that the adoption of this legislation might maining days of the month when the so-caned quota resolver.

"It has been suggested that the adoption of this legislation might result in discrimination in favor of boarding officers and those engaged in train work as compared with officers who are sometimes compelled to work overtime at the immigration stations. I do not believe this is a valid objection, however, for the reason that hours of work at the stations can, as a rule, be controlled while, as already pointed out, the work of boarding and train officers at times is subject to the movement of steamships and trains.

"However, the most unsatisfactory phase is the existing discrimination which results from the law under which customs officials are reimbursed for overtime work by the transportation companies, while our own officers who are obliged to perform similar work under the same conditions receive no compensation for their overtime labor."

Cordially yours,

JAMES J. DAVIS.

It appears from the testimony given before the committee on December 15, 1922, that:

IMMIGRANT INSPECTORS AND THEIR WORK.

December 15, 1922, that:

IMMIGRARY INSPECTORS AND THEIR WORK.

The duties, responsibilities, and character of the work of immigrant inspectors are of such importance, affecting, as they do, the future welfare of the country, that any measure that will improve the countries of the country, that any measure that will improve the countries of the country, that any measure that will improve the countries of the country, that any measure that will improve the countries of their work and their positions.

The purpose of the immigration laws, as intended by Congress, is to provide for a discriminating selection of applicants for admission to the country, so as to keep out those who are undestrable, prevent a low-ering of the standards of citizenship, and preserve the mental, moral, and physical make-up of the Nation from the deteriorating influence of allens who are physically, mentally, morally, or racially undesirable.

The frequent changes in the immigration laws indicate the great of the country of the tatatesment in the immigration problem and reflects the concern of the statesment in the immigration problem and reflects the concern of the statesment in the immigration will be appreciated among the governments of the world: the United States has attained among the governments of the world: the United States has attained among the governments of the world: the United States has attained among the governments of the world: to such efficient personnel, proper organization demands that they perform service under the best possible conditions, and that they receive such compensation as will continue to improve the morale of the force and the states of the continuent of the provention of the New World. They are the first Government officers to meet incoming strangers, and it is essential that they be of such caliber and personality as to be fitting representatives of the United States Government. First impressions are lasting; and it is proper that strangers coming to our country should be favorably impressed with the

The officers engaged in this important work of enforcing the immigration laws should be such as would reflect credit on the Government, the service, and themselves. They should be well dressed, of pleasing personality and address, and know how to combine tact and consideration with a firm sense of duty. To obtain, maintain, and retain such a force it is essential that they be well paid and treated with consideration. Many of their duties are extremely irksome, and they are frequently attended with great personal risk. A particularly unpleasant feature is that they are almost constantly exposed to unjust criticism or false accusation by those displeased with the conduct of or the action taken in certain cases.

DUTIES OF IMMIGRANT INSPECTORS.

DUTIES OF IMMIGRANT INSPECTORS.

1. To board all incoming vessels and trains from foreign countries, see that the ship's papers concerning the passengers and crew are in proper order, and have the captains make oath to the truth of such documents, as required by law.

2. To quickly and accurately pass on the cases of all passengers claiming citizenship. (Hundreds of persons are discovered each year falsely claiming citizenship.)

3. To promptly examine all allens as to their admissibility under the immigration law.

4. To examine all passports and determine if they are regular and valid.

4. To examine all passports and determine if they are regular and valid.

5. To detain for special inquiry all aliens not clearly and beyond a doubt qualified to land.

6. To examine the crews of all vessels, both passenger and freight, and detain those not eligible to enter or who may be diseased.

7. To temporarily detain certain aliens, such as those whose addresses are indefinite, or who may have lost their addresses, or who may accompany others who are held for further medical observation.

8. To detain pending the appearance of relatives children and women destined to New York and vicinity who have never been in the United States before; this with a view to seeing that the aliens fall into proper hands.

9. To act as judges in quasi judicial capacity as members of boards of special inquiry, which boards investigate the cases of those detained because they are not clearly and beyond a doubt qualified to land, examining the aliens, their relatives or other witnesses, and ordering admission or deportation of the applicant.

10. To supervise the detention of all aliens until they are allowed to land or are deported.

13. THE OLDER IMMIGRATION ANY EETTER OR WORSE THAN THE NEWER?

IS THE OLDER IMMIGRATION ANY BETTER OR WORSE THAN THE NEWER? We have recently seen how Italy has quietly and peacefully handled a change in the manner of the conduct of its Government and how successfully that change has been. As we have said, no one will assert that the Polish Government which has been recently set up is not endeavoring in every possible way to maintain its stability. The same is true of Czechoslovakla. where common sense and reason seem to be the guiding standard in all changes being done. Yet under the proposed legislation if the census of 1890 be taken as the basis, these people will be discriminated against. If we look across the seas and see how things have been turned topsy-turvy by the miners and railroad men, it must set thinking men to slowly come to the belief that immigration from Great Britain is not in any respect better, as far this country is concerned, than those who have come from the other countries and who have helped build our subways, construct our buildings, lay the railroad tracks, and,

The person who attempts to raise religious and racial prejudice is unworthy of American citizenship. We are in grave danger of losing our sense of fair play and treating men according to their real worth. So extensive has been the carrying on of false propaganda against the foreign born and immigration in general that hatred and prejudice against them seem temporarily, it is to be hoped, to have supplanted reason and common sense. What have been heretofore conceded and undisputed facts as to the foreign-born rendition of hard work in the building of roads, railroads, subways, and building construction are now being denied by writers in muckraking magazines, who seem bent to make money on sensationalism and forgetting the numerous warnings which have been sounded by every true American statesman for more than a hundred years, that he who creates racial and religious schisms in our midst is unworthy of American citizenship and false to its ideals and traditions. No milder words can express the true characterization of such creatures. Not contented simply giving facts, they persist in drawing false conclusions even after having adopted false premises as a basis thereof. The same is true of lecturers and writers who are coming here to sow the seeds of racial and religious dissent and simultaneously mulcting Americans of their dollars.

The American people in their hearts are the fairest and most just on the face of the globe. How long will they permit this spirit of intolerance and falsehood to be preached? How long will they permit these poisoners of public opinion to reap the harvest of dollars from the sale of such publications, and at the same time damaging the body politic? Every believer in the liberty and freedom of the press to have the right to publish the facts must give these matters grave concern and thought.

To vilify human beings because they are immigrants or their descendants, without real reason, regardless of whether they are citizens or declarants, is a pastime which eventually must produce evil consequences. I make these remarks after having watched for more than eight years the growth of this un-American spirit in our midst. The real American realizes that patriotism does not consist merely in fighting for one's country on the battle field. It means more than that. It means the desire and the will to serve the Republic most faithfully at such a time as the Nation requires one's services.

The real patriot to-day is the man who gives the best that he possesses in behalf of the American people, whether in public service or in private life. To merely work and to expend one's earnings, are actions that a machine could just as well perform. We are living in an age when the individual must not only serve himself but must make constant sacrifices for the common welfare. By that I mean that it is the duty of every citizen to participate in every movement which tends in any degree to improve the body politic and the general welfare of the community in which he resides. Such a citizen when he simply votes does not consider that by such an act alone he has performed his full duty to his country. He takes an interest in the public-school system by actively participating in the discussion as to whether children are getting the most that can be secured from that particular educational curriculum. He makes every effort to improve conditions in his immediate neighborhood and urges the establishment of playgrounds for children. He occasionally finds time to visit public institutions for the purpose of learning how they are being managed and perhaps make some suggestions. He learns early in life that it is better to help develop and build up than to be one whose sole occupation in life is to criticize, destroy, and tear down. He loves his country and flag most who does all in his power to observe most faithfully both the moral and legal law in what he does. Now and then he finds time to visit the hospitals and write letters for such physically incapacitated patients who need such aid or render other assistance. observes his own religious faith and respects the beliefs of his neighbors. He loves his home life and takes a deep interest in the education of his own children. No sacrifice is too great for him to make in their behalf. He learns early in life that public office is a public trust. He would rather give up his office than surrender his conscience. He puts truth above all things. He hates the hypocrite. He demands sincerity.

When his country calls for volunteers he is not a slacker. He is one who believes in deeds and not mere utterances. He observes the Ten Commandments and is not jealous of the prosperity of his neighbor, regardless of the place of his birth. Such is the real patriotic American citizen. Such is the type that we desire our citizens to be. Such a kind does not seek thanks and does not expect it. Such a type is rarely found mentioned in the newspapers or other public prints. He goes through life loyal, honest, energetic, faithful, devoted, and a constant inspiration to all who know him, and when he passes from this world to the far beyond his friends who remain realize that a faithful servant of this world has met his reward.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, this law will prove a boon to humanity. Anything that tends to make more interesting a clean, instructive, fascinating hobby, or assists in facilitating the extension of such a popular pastime as stamp collecting, is conferring a blessing on a group estimated by some to be as large as a million persons in this country.

While this act amends the penal code in the direction indicated, yet it is a moot question at the present time whether the laws now existing were intended to cover the illustrations which would make clearer to the mind's eye spaces in a stamp album or to visualize from the description in the text of catalogues. These crude black and defaced illustrations which have been used ever since stamp collecting started, some threequarters of a century ago, are merely pathfinders for the correct places where the genuine specimen should be placed and in no sense can they be considered as a substitute for the original article. If there is anything that the true collector abhors, it is a counterfeit or a repaired or imperfect specimen.

Besides bringing to the coffers of the United States Treasury a sum exceeding $100,000 per annum of net revenue, through the sales of stamps at the philatelic agency of the Post Office Department, and in addition thereto defraying all the expense of making the new dies and plates, the Government secures at all times the collateral interest by having this million pairs of eyes throughout the country actively engaged in looking out for anything that rogues might do in their efforts to foist upon the public counterfeit stamps or securities. It can be readily seen that the educational effect of encouraging this clean, upbuilding, instructive hobby has a worth far greater than is perceptible at first.

All classes and ages, from the lowliest and youngest to the most influential and the oldest, and also both sexes, become devotees of this fascinating pursuit which has no deleterious effects and which if pursued along proper lines is not only a source of pleasure but may become a means of substantial profit, in the event that the hobby for any reason is abandoned. Governments could not do better than to assist in such a meritorious pursuit as this one and it is hoped that this action of Congress will be a forerunner of more consideration on behalf of public officials in the future than has been manifested in the past for the ubiquitous stamp collector.

An article in Ewens Weekly Stamp News, recently published, gives the number of collectors on the globe at 2,930,000 and the number of collectors annually buying one or more catalogues at 250.000

Another authority gives the number of collectors in the respective countries as follows:

Germany	440,000
Austria-Hungary	110,000
Great Britain	363, 000
Russia, Scandinavia, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Balkan States_	60,000
France, Belgium, Netherlands, Switzerland, Luxemburg	300,000
United States and Canada	1, 000, 000
Mexico, Central and South America	20,000
Africa and Australia	10,000
Asia	20,000

Total for the globe_

These figures are believed to be substantially accurate. any event they indicate the growing popularity of philately, which has far outstripped that of numismatics, which for centuries has been looked upon as well worthy of high consideration not only by all civilized governments but by the most distinguished savants and literati. Our own Government at the Smithsonian Institution maintains a curator and publishes a list of the stamps of the United States issued up to 1920, and by reason of this legislation the pages of the catalogue may in the future be embellished with illustrations, thus increasing its usefulness to the average collector.

The long line of literature which has been issued touching upon philately in later years has been added to by the issuance of a "Who's Who," wherein may be found the name of celebrities, from the rulers of the greatest nations, princes of royal blood, to statesmen, admirals, generals, actors, foresters, sing-ers, and philosophers in all parts of the globe. All these classes have recognized the intellectual value of this hobby. Its farreaching educational value is accompanied by a charm of persistence which grips the enthusiast, by a devotion that never can be totally eliminated. The collectors of the country are grateful to Congress for having enacted this legislation.

Whereas the State of Oregon delivers by mail to every registered voter of the State certain pamphlets before every general election, some of which set forth the claims and merits of the candidates for political party nominations at the primary nominating elections, and others of which set forth the claims and merits of the candidates of different political parties and of independent candidates for public office, and other pamphlets containing the measures submitted to the legal voters for their approval or rejection, with arguments for and against the same; and Legislature of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Senate Joint Memorial No. 6.

Military Affairs:

Senate Joint Memorial No. 6.

Whereas at the Legislative Assembly of the Oregon State Legislature held in the year 1864 the Government of the United States, in the interest of its Military Establishment, requested the State of Oregon to cede all of its right, title, and interest in and to certain land in front of Fort Stevens, Point Adams, and also to Sand Island, all of which lands were situated at the mouth of the Columbia River, in Clatsop County, Oreg.; and

Whereas in pursuance of said request said Legislative Assembly of Oregon at the session held that year passed an act, "An act to grant to the United States all right, title, and interest of the State of Oregon to certain tidelands herein mentioned." The said act passed both the house and senate and was duly approved on the 21st day of October, 1864, by Addison C. Gibbs, Governor of the State of Oregon, bill being House bill No. 65 of said legislature held in 1864; and

Whereas said United States Government has never in any manner whatsoever made use of said Sand Island for military purposes nor for any other purpose except as hereinafter stated; and

Whereas for a great number of years last passed the War Department of the Federal Government, through its engineering department, has leased said Sand Island to different persons and corporations for the purpose of salmon seining, and has received through the medium of said leases large sums of money approximating several hundred thousand dollars; and

Whereas the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon feels that by reason of the fact that this revenue has been secured from a non-military commercial use of said Sand Island, a use never contemplated at the time this land was ceded by the State of Oregon feels that by reason of the fact that this revenue has been secured from a non-military commercial use of said Sand Island, a use never contemplated at the time this land was ceded by the State of Oregon feels that of Oregon, and believes it unfair that the United States Government ret of Oregon; that when so received by the treasurer of the State of Oregon the secretary of state shall draw a warrant payable to the city of Astoria upon the treasurer of the State of Oregon for the amount of the money so turned over by the Federal Government to the State of Oregon; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be immediately wired by the secretary of state to the Clerk of the United States Senate and to the Clerk of the United States House of Representatives and to each of the Oregon Members of Congress.

Mr. PHIPPS presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Colorado, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining:

Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 6, petitioning the Congress of the United States to assist the silver-mining industry.

To the Schate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Governor and Legislature of the State of Colorado, respectfully represent that—
Whereas the production of silver is an important industry of the United States and affords employment directly to many thousands of persons and indirectly to thousands of others; and
Whereas on account of its association with other metals, especially lead and zinc in ores, an inadequate price for silver increases the cost of production of lead and zinc, and thereby adds to the cost of materials essential to many construction activities; and
Whereas it is also desirable to maintain silver-mining operations in the United States so as to meet the coinage requirements of various countries in which commerce and industry are in process of rehabilitation and can not be fully reestablished without additional supplies of metallic money; and
Whereas the prospective early completion of silver repurchases under the provisions of the Pittman Act is liable to disrupt the silver-mining industry of the United States and in part suspend silver production unless measures be taken to preserve the industry: Now, therefore, be and it is and it is.

Resolved, That the Governor and Legislature of the State of Colorado respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to give sympathetic and early consideration to this phase of silver-mining industry and enact such legislation as may be necessary in the premises.

Mr. EDGE presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of New Jersey, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

NEW JERSEY SENATE, Woodbury, N. J., February 26, 1928.

Hon. Walter E. Edge, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Inclosed herewith find copy of concurrent resolu-tion, which passed both the senate and the house of assembly. Yours very truly,

WM. H. Albright, Secretary,

Whereas it is a matter of public knowledge and a subject of discussion in the public press that there has been maladministration and too frequent failures to function properly of the United States Veterans' Bureau in what is termed the second district, including the States of New Jersey, New York, and Connecticut, involving an unspeakable wastefulness of public funds and a demoralization of the facilities designed by the Federal Government to be everlastingly beneficial to the veterans of the late war who were maimed and disabled in the service of their country; and

Whereas such past maladministration and failure to properly and efficiently function is burtful alike to the State and to the individuals involved; and WM. H. ALBRIGHT, Secretary.

Whereas recent investigation has disclosed among other things that disabled soldiers have been grossly misadvised and placed in training in occupations which they could never hope to master because of their obvious physical infirmities; that they have been neglected and many valuable years of their lives wasted by their being kept in training in these trades despite their protests and appeals for transfers to vocations more suitable to their physical capacities; that thousands of maimed veterans have been left to idle away years in mushroom institutions that have little facilities for their instruction and less interest in their welfare; that the conclusion of the periods of training of several thousands of these soldiers will arrive in July, and that they will be thrown upon the streets with scarcely any real vocational preparations to grapple once more with the problems of life: Now, therefore, be it

*Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of New Jersey (the Senate concurring)—

fore, be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of New Jersey (the Resolved concurring)—

1. That mindful of the welfare of the men who cheerfully offered their lives at the call of their country, and desirous of carrying out the intent of beneficent laws in the interest of vocational training for the United States veterans of the World War, respectfully records a protest against inefficient control and direction of their occupational training and progress and emphasizes the necessity for enforcement of all laws, rules, and regulations designed to benefit the veterans, and to that end ask the Congress and President of the United States to take such action as will insure the restoration of the disabled soldiers of the New Jersey, New York, and Connecticut district to self-reliance and usefulness.

2. That there shall be further decentralization of compensation and permanently rated cases to district control, thereby benefiting the exservice disabled soldier by improving and expediting the service to be rendered him.

3. That adequate power be vested in the district manager to place subordinates in the positions he believes them best fitted for and remove inefficiency from the organization regardless of political affiliations, and furthermore that authority be granted to hire locally expert advisers and technically trained persons that will insure a proper administration in the second district.

4. That the matter of control of hospitals be placed in the district office and not in Washington as at present. That there should be a permancy to the office of district manager and that we be assured of a continuance of present policies and administration, except as above set forth.

5. That copies of this resolution be immediately sent to all United set forth.

5. That copies of this resolution be immediately sent to all United States Senators and Congressmen.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, from the Committee on the Judiclary I report back favorably with an amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 40) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and I submit a report (No. 1235) thereon.

This joint resolution is what is known as the Wadsworth resolution, which proposes an amendment to the Constitution. The favorable report which I now make embraces an amendment to the Wadsworth resolution, and in that form it is reported to the Senate. The Wadsworth resolution is an amendment to Article V of the Constitution, and is therefore an amendment to the amendatory clause of the Constitution. The Wadsworth resolution as originally drawn provided that when a proposed amendment is submitted to the States it should be submitted to the State legislatures, one house of which must be elected after the amendment is submitted. It further pro-vided that a State may, if desired, have a referendum of the people.

As amended and now reported to the Senate, the Wadsworth amendment provides that a proposed amendment to the Constitution shall be submitted directly to the qualified voters of the

I desire to make this statement because some of us do not favor the amendment in the form in which it is now reported to the Senate, and I for one desire, when the amendment comes up for consideration in the Senate, to move to restore the resolution to its original form.

I ask that the joint resolution may go to the calendar.

REGULATION OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I submit a resolution, and after it is read I shall ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. I ask that the same be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona asks leave to submit a resolution, which, without objection, the Secretary will read.

The resolution (S. Res. 457) was read, as follows:

Resolved. That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby requested to report to the Senate all matters relating to the administration of paragraphs 9, 10, and 11 of section 5 of the interstate commerce act relating to the operation and control of common carriers by water by reliroads.

(a) To what extent, if any, extensions of time beyond July 1, 1914, rail carriers have been permitted to control and operate water carriers.

(b) To what carriers extensions have been granted and the effect such grants have had upon rates of competing water carriers or competing rail earriers, or both.
(c) What exemptions, if any, have been granted, under section 4 of the act, to carriers jointly operating rail and water lines, jointly owned and controlled.
(d) What interpretation the commission has placed on the aforesaid paragraphs of section 5 with respect to permanent or continuous extensions beyond the statutory period—July 1, 1914.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have just stated that I should object to any other requests at this time. If I yield to the Senator, I shall have to yield to others. I dislike to object, but I think we can dispose of the pending motion in a very little bit, and then all these things can be disposed of. I call for the regular order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that he has waived his statement that he would object to the transaction of any further business by unanimous consent, pending the disposition of the motion to recommit, by permitting the matter to be submitted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not say I would not permit any business to be transacted; I meant the passage of any I will say to the Senator that I was engaged, bill or resolution. and I did not really know what was being done. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is called for.

The resolution will go over under the rule.

Subsequently Mr. ASHURST said: Mr. President, some three hours ago I introduced a Senate resolution asking the Interstate Commerce Commission to report certain data to the Senate. I find, upon a careful investigation, that the Interstate Commerce Commission will require some time to collate the data, so, of course, I have no hope of obtaining the same before the close of this Congress; but I now ask that my resolution be laid before the Senate and passed, because it is obvious that the debate on the motion to recommit the shipping bill is going to go on for some time. I now ask action on my resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I gave notice a while ago that I would not allow any other business to be transacted until this motion was acted on. I do not like to object to a request like that of the Senator from Arizona, but if I yield to him I shall have to yield to others. I hope we can get rid of this motion in a very little while.

Mr. ASHURST. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Washington. He has been far more patient than I thought one could be, and far more patient than he should have been; but, Mr. President, there are other subjects requiring attention.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know there are, and I want

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, out of order I ask leave to present a report from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not present that report at the present time.

Mr. SPENCER. It is a report from the Committee on Indian Affairs which ought to be printed and laid upon the desks of Senators. I do not intend to call it up to-day.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator to withhold it for the present.

POLICE COURT JUDGES IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BALL submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 458), which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Whereas the police court of the District of Columbia was established about 1870 with one judge assigned thereto, and in 1891 a second judge appointed, and said police court divided into the United States branch and the District of Columbia branch; and Whereas despite the increase in population, the increased number of laws, and the largely increased tendency toward crime, and the expansion of the business of said court by more than 100 per cent since 1890; and laws, and the largely increased tendency toward crime, and the expansion of the business of said court by more than 100 per cent since 1800; and

Whereas it would seem to be impossible for two judges to properly transact the business of such a congested court as it arises and do full justice to the community or to persons on trial; and

Whereas the said court is said to be more than 500 cases behind its current docket in the liquor division alone and 90 per cent of persons charged with violating liquor laws demand jury trials; and

Whereas the United States branch of said police court only has jurisdiction of liquor cases and only two afternoons of each week can be set aside for jury trials; and

Whereas it is reported that many arrests are made daily involving violations of liquor laws, of which 90 per cent are said to demand jury trials; and

Whereas it has been estimated that if said court were to lay aside all other forms of law violation it would take more than a year to clear up existing congestion in said court, without including arrests made meanwhile: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to investigate conditions with regard to congestion in said police court, and report at the beginning of the first session of the Sixty-eighth Congress upon the advisability or necessity of legislation looking to an increase in the number of judges of said police court. police court.

LAND-BANK LOANS

Mr. NORBECK. I present an article from the Country Gentleman, entitled "More money or move," which I request may be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in 8-point type, as follows:

[From the Country Gentleman.]

MORE MONEY OR MOVE-THE FATE OF MANY HINGES ON BIGGER LAND-BANK LOANS,

(By Samuel R. Guard.)

For 35 years John Wells has been one of the most prosperous up-to-date wheat and cattle ranchers in the Solomon Valley. In two months he will probably be penniless.

In 1919 John Wells had his hard luck along with the rest of us. He lost more than $25,000 raising wheat and live stock. John's credit was good and he borrowed $20,000 at 7½ per cent interest, giving a first mortgage on his 350-acre valley farm.

He figured that by another year with market conditions back to normal, $20,000 wouldn't be hard to pay off. But in 1920 commodity prices took another downward sweep. His wheat sold for only $1.30 a bushel. His fat steers went for $7.50 in the Kansas City yards.

So again he borrowed, this time giving a second mortgage for $15,000. In March, 1923, that first mortgage will be due. But John will not be able to meet it. Neither can be renew it at high interest rates, He says: "If I could only borrow $25,000 from the Federal land bank in Wichita I could pay off these mortgages and get on my feet again. As it is I'm going to the wall. I'll be just where I was 35 years ago-and I'm not a young man any more.

In the office of the president of the American Farm Bureau Federation there is a pile of letters 3 feet high—12,000 of them. Every letter tells a hard-luck story—the story of John Wells, of Kansas. These letters were solicited by the farm bureau in its compaign to abolish the $10,000 limit on Federal farm loans. They mirror life on the farm during the past three years. They show why relief must come before settlement day—moving day—in March. For instance:

"Please use all the influence possible to increase the maximum to see the maximum to see mum of $10,000 for Federal farm loans to $25,000. To me and my family it means the saving of everything we possess—our 320 acres of land, our home which we built by years of careful saving. It means the keeping together of my five boys and the money with which to give them a decent education. Immediate increase in the loan limit is my only hope. This deflation business has put my bank account about $10,000 more in the red than it was in 1919. With my farm mortgaged for $25,000 I can not hold out much longer. I have two mortgages, one due in the spring of 1924 and the other due now. I have been threatened with foreclosure in spite of the fact that I have spent $3,000 tilling the farm. I can not afford to renew the note and pay 5 per cent to local bankers. I can not meet the whole debt at this time. Perhaps I could hold on until spring if I felt sure that the farm-loan limit would be increased to $25,000. could get relief on a long-time loan through our local association. If we farmers can obtain a loan on a well-improved half section of land, say for $20,000 or $25,000 for a long-time payment on the amortization plan, we can make good. If we have to continue to borrow from year to year at a high rate, living in hell all 12 months for fear that the principal will be called for, then the sooner we quit working for 9 cents an hour and get off the farm the better. We implore your help."

The letter bears the signature of a prominent farmer in South

This one is from a farm woman in Illinois:

"Won't you do everything you can to have the Federal farmloan maximum raised? They surely don't realize down in Washington what that means to the farm people of the Middle West or they would have raised it before. Now, ourselves for instance. We bought a good, small 76-acre farm for $16,000. We have paid $3,500 on the principal and $575 interest and taxes. When prices for farm produce fell we couldn't make the payment of $500 plus interest, or $750 a year. Now, the people we bought from threaten to foreclose in the spring. lose the savings of 20 years as renters. If we could borrow only $13,000 from the Federal Farm Loan Association and pay off this mortgage we would be all right. For a long-time loan at 5½ per cent interest we could easily pay, especially as prices are gradually coming back to normal. A first mortgage on our land would be good security, too, as it is unusually well improved and of good soil fertility. An increase in the loan limit before the coming spring means the saving of hundreds of middle western farmers who are now facing failure. The increasing of the Federal farm-loan fund is our only hope. Can you give us any assurance?

Those 12,000 letters came from every State in the Union. And they read like a schoolboy's copybook. They all say the same thing-bought a farm to make a home, drop in prices, short-time loans at high rates, mortgages coming due, no money in sight. And no crop between now and March. But there is hope for them through Federal farm loans, provided the artificial and inadequate $10,000 limit is abolished by Congress.

PAYING LOANS BY INSTALLMENTS.

No legislation can be passed which will make the farmer ultimately prosperous. His prosperity is regulated by the prices that his products bring on the market. But much of the distress of the past three years could have been saved if he had been fully supplied with credit agencies which would have enabled him to hold his crops over price-depression periods. With an increase of the maximum loan limit, the Federal land banks can furnish necessary long-time credit at the lowest net

Paradoxical though it sounds, distress to-day is the most prevalent in the best agricultural sections. It is in these sec-tions that the present loan limit is so low as to destroy the usefulness of the farm-loan system. It is not the small farmer nor the chap operating a cheap farm on small capital outlay who is most in need of help. In the period of easy credits the small farmer with little security could not procure loans. But the rancher and Corn-Belt farmers, those operating the fine, big farms, were given almost unrestricted purchasing power. They incurred large debts based upon farm commodity values, which were generally believed to be reasonable and fairly permanent-permanent enough to buy and sell land on,

No relief can be given the farmer of this type by the plan of making farm loans on a five-year basis at excessive rates, nor by continuing to carry his indebtedness on short-term paper through six-month periods, sooner or later to be called or else renewed at higher interest charges. In these periods of de-flated prices there is nothing the farmer can do to liquidate his great burden of debts on any other basis than the amortization over a long period of years at the lowest possible rate.

Amortization is the payment of a loan by installments. farmer who borrows through the Federal land bank is free to specify any number of years, ranging from 5 to 40, in which to pay off his loan. And if later he finds he can pay the loan in less time it is his privilege to do so.

There is a total in the United States of 790,871 farms which because of the present loan limit of $10,000 can not utilize the Federal farm-loan system. In Iowa the average farm, according to the 1920 census report, has 156.8 acres. The Farm Loan Board has restricted loans on any farm to a maximum of $100 attacked the constitutionality of the law.

an acre. The Federal land bank of the eighth district, with this limitation, can not serve the average farmer of Iowa with the necessary loan of $15,000. Census figures show that the average value of a farm in Iowa is $34,662; South Dakota, $29,350; Nebraska, $29,283; and Nevada, $23,834.

In the Corn Belt the average-size farm is 200 acres, with an average value of approximately $40,000. The average standard ranch in the grazing sections of the United States has a value of between $50,000 and $60,000.

Statistics show that the average rate which farmers and ranchmen are paying for money in Arkansas is 7.8 per cent; Georgia, 7.3 per cent; Oklahoma, 6.6 per cent; Texas, 7.2 per cent; Montana, 7.6 per cent; and Wyoming, 7.6 per cent. Paying 2 per cent above Federal land bank rates means an unnecessary loss of $500 on every $25,000 borrowed.

Mortgages in excess of $10,000 are the rule and not the exception in the rich farming districts. Take, for example, a typical county in the Corn Belt—Taylor County, Iowa. During the years 1918 to 1922, inclusive, there were 420 mortgages exceeding $10.000 filed for record. The average for each mortgage was $17,317.74.

The opponents of the increased loan claim that the act was passed to serve only the poor farmers, and that by an increase of the loan limit wealthy farmers would in time monopolize the loan market. Incidentally they realize that they themselves would lose an equal amount of business,

The purpose of the Federal land bank is set forth in the first sentence of the law, which reads: "An act to provide capital for agricultural development, to create standard forms of investment based upon farm mortgage, to equalize rates of interest upon farm loans, to furnish a market for United States bonds, to create Government depositories and financial agents for the United States, and for other purposes."

This does not imply that the law was made only for small farmers. In its own words it was "created for agricultural development."

TRUE COOPERATION.

The law is founded upon the principle of cooperation. It can not be truly cooperative and discriminate against any one class of farmers. Neither can it afford to discriminate. in order to serve the poor farmer at a low rate it is necessary that there be a large volume of business done in the Corn Belt-the rich farming sections.

Federal land banks cover the whole country-no matter how remote the neighborhood, how scarce the money, or how small the farm. If the farm is large enough to support the borrower and productive enough to repay the loan, the Federal land banks, through the cooperative system, stand ready to serve. Unlike private mortgage companies, they do not choose their territory. They go where they are needed. The Federal Land Bank of Spokane, Wash., brought relief to drought-stricken Montana. The bank of Wichita lent to the farmers of the drought-baked plains of western Kansas. The land banks have gone down into the small districts of the South where farmers hardly knew their land was good for a loan of any kind. Sometimes they wrote loans as small as $200. To the one-horse farmer this offer meant escape from the grip of a crossroad Shylock. It is the profits from the business in the rich farming regions that make these small loans at the 5½ per cent rate possible.

For this reason farm-loan banks are made interdependent, In locating the 12 banks the Farm Loan Board, in so far as possible, balanced the various districts with a fair proportion of the highly valued and the lower valued lands.

The necessity of a larger loan limit was early recognized and recommended by the Federal Farm Loan Board.

Farmers the country over are looking toward this cooperative system for help. In an effort to find out the true sentiment of the farmer on the subject of a loan increase the American Farm Bureau Federation sent out, through the farm bureaus of the various States, a questionnaire ballot upon the increase of the loan limit of the Federal land banks from $10,000 to $25,000. Returns on these ballots showed 77,565 favoring the amendment as against 16,060 opposed. A number of recent State conventions, various business men's and bankers' organizations, and representative farmers' organizations, recognizing this amendment as one of the most necessary steps in the restoration of the prosperity of the American farmer, have passed resolutions favoring its early adoption. Scores of daily papers and farm journals have earnestly advocated this increased loan limit.

Ever since the passing of the act the farm-loan system has had a fight on with the old-line farm-mortgage bankers. They

Now the Supreme Court has declared the system constitutional, and the bond market will absorb all the issues which the Federal land banks may see fit to offer. Their bonds out-sell in the market any other agricultural security.

The 12 Federal land banks were organized by the United States Government with an original capital stock of $9,000,000. The capital stock to-day is more than $36,000,000, thanks to the efficiency and popularity of the system. The land banks have total assets of $694,357,096 and reserves of $2,532,500. The surplus and undivided profits are considerably more than $5,000,000. All 12 banks are on a dividend-paying basis. Every one is earning a surplus. It seems that 5½ per cent is a profitable interest at which to lend money on farm land.

Remember the farms that changed hands in 1918? Most of them on a five-year-payment plan? March next will be settle-ment day. These farms are in the hands of eager, progressive, hard-working young farmers. Shall they be dispossessed? Or will Congress give them access to the cooperative long-time credit now held under an arbitrary $10,000 lock on the door of the Federal farm-loan system?

Every indication is that Congress will abolish the $10,000 limit.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] to re-commit the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ROBINSON. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, before this motion is put I desire to say a word upon the shipping bill, so called. I shall occupy only a very few moments, as I have nothing prepared in written form.

I have been waiting for weeks with the vain hope that the shipping bill might be held before the Senate in order that it could be discussed and amendments offered to it. Since I have been a Member of Congress, for 20 years, the subsidy matter has been up several times, and I have always voted against a direct subsidy, except for the carrying of United States mail. At this time, however, I have felt that it was my duty to support any present method, in the absence of any other or better one, which would, in my judgment, save to my country a portion at least of the $3,000,000,000 worth of steel ships, or ships that cost us that much, in order that they could be used for the benefit of American commerce.

It has been stated here repeatedly by Senators who are opposed to the shipping bill that Senators who were defeated at the last election should have nothing to say about this bill. It has been stated with a good deal of vigor that this matter of a ship subsidy was an Issue in the late campaign, and therefore, it having been decided against the subsidy then, that it ought not to be brought up at this session of Congress. The question of ship subsidy, to my knowledge, was not mentioned in the campaign in Michigan. I am positive that it did not enter, even in the remotest degree, into the determination of the election, but even if it had I should still feel that it was my duty to vote my convictions during my constitutional term of office in the Senate. I know that the people of my State would expect me to do that. I would not knowingly or consciously vote differently after the election than I voted before the election.

During my term here I have always been governed, so far as I know and am conscious, by convictions of duty, regardless of my own political fortunes. I think it will be conceded that if I had paid a little more attention to politics as I have seen it played so many times the result in Michigan would have been different from what it was, but I am not complaining in the least. I am not at all cast down over the result, and am perfectly willing to bow to the decision of our people in that election, although less than a majority of the voters went to the polls on the 7th day of November.

Mr. President, I repeat that when this bill came before the Senate I felt that it was my duty to do the best I could to di pose of the steel ships that were owned by the United States for the benefit of the whole country. I had hoped that we might proceed to consider this bill upon its merits, and that it might be amended, that I might have an opportunity to offer some amendments to it; but from the beginning the decree went forth that this bill should not be voted upon at this session of Congress.

Early in the discussion the camouflage, which deceived no-body, put forth by those opposed to the bill to the effect that a filibuster was not being indulged, was clearly discovered by all of us, even the Senators who made the assertion that no filibuster existed. I maintain that the time to have indulged a filibuster, if one was to be indulged, was when every last effort had been put forth by the Senate to amend this bill, because a large majority of the Senate believe in doing something for the benefit of our merchant marine. They say, "Not this bill; some other bill"; and yet we have been denied the opportunity to place any other bill before the Senate.

There has been some real discussion of this bill. I have not listened to all of the arguments, but I recall clearly the argument of the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones], who has charge of the bill, an argument that has not been answered, as it seems to me; the argument of the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], which has not been answered; the argument of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Frelinghuysen], which was a clear statement; and others. On the opposite side there has been the argument of the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. Fletcher]. I listened with a great deal of interest to what he said, because I have confidence in that Senator, as I have in the others. I was instructed by this kind of discussion; but the great amount of the time of the Senate has been taken up by Senators who were not discussing this question at all, simply for the purpose of playing politics.

Mr. President, I have been in the Congress long enough to deplore this disposition on the part of some Senators to so construe the issues that are presented to the Senate, to misrepresent to the public things as they really are in order that some political advantage may be had by one party or the other. I suppose, so long as we have party government, that may ways be indulged. Nevertheless, Mr. President, I deplore this disposition, because it may be, and frequently is, a serious question. A large majority of the Senate believe the pending bill is a serious question; yet we were prevented from voting upon amendments whereby a larger part of the subsidy, if a subsidy were granted, could be given to the cargo ships. What subsidy were granted, could be given to the cargo ships. we ought to do, and what I believe must be done before we have a permanent merchant marine, is to make an allowance in some form-call it by whatever name you will-which approximately equals the difference in the cost of construction and operation of American vessels as compared with the cost and maintenance of ships of our competitors.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield. Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator has made reference to the possibility of amending the bill in the Senate, and argues, as understand, that we ought to have considered the bill and acted upon amendments.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What does the Senator think about that proposition?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am leading up to that. The Senator realizes that if the Senate had adopted amendments to the bill they would have been undoubtedly disagreed to in the House and the matter would have gone to conference, and then the question would have been whether the Senate conferees would have receded from those amendments, and we would have had the House bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is a speculation, of course; but I am talking now about the duty of Senators. I am not discussing what might or might not have happened, but I am discussing the deplorable fact that there has been no opportunity to discuss this bill.

Of course, Senators who were opposed to the bill have risen and called it a filibuster when anybody spoke on the bill. have never believed that it was filibustering to discuss honestly matter pending before the Senate. I have thought that that was the function of the Senate-to discuss matters pending before it. Of course, I do not like this repetition of arguments over and over again. I do not like this introduction of extraneous matters into a serious concern like this; and some day, Senators, this question will have to be settled, because in spite of prejudice and passion the people of the United States realize that we must have a merchant marine.

The only proposition before the Senate now is the bill as introduced, to which no opportunity has been given for amendment or for discussion of amendments. If we could have devoted all of the time to this bill and put it in the best shape possible, then if Senators wanted to indulge in a filibuster they could have done it just as well when it came to the final disposition of the bill as they can now, or have been able to do at any time since we have been considering the measure.

I have nothing in particular to say in reference to the filibuster. I indulged in one myself once. I have always been a little ashamed of it.

I am not just now condemning Senators so much for that as I am for their action in preventing consideration of the bill. So, Mr. President, I have been favoring action on this measure, hoping vainly that the time would come when Senators seriously minded would be attempting to put it in the best shape possible in order that I could exert what influence I had for the ideas which possessed me. That opportunity has gone by; everybody knows why and how. Much of the talk against it has been for political reasons. Unworthy appeals, as it seems to me, to the press and to the voters of the country on matters about which they must know but little, have been made for the purpose of prejudicing their sentiment. As far as I am concerned, I regret it exceedingly.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. KING. The Senator is a very fair man, and I concede his great interest in this bill and his absolute sincerity in the argument which he is making. His remarks, of course, can not be leveled at me, because I have not spoken on the bill at any length; but does not the Senator feel that he is a little unjust in charging that the arguments or the statements on the floor against the bill have been made merely to deceive? Does not the Senator know that many of the Senators who are opposing this bill have acted in the utmost good faith and be-lieved that the bill was misconceived; that it was drawn by certain shipping interests in their interest for their profit; that it was hostile to the best interests of the American people and would not eventuate in giving a merchant marine to the American people? I am sure that on reconsideration the Senator will feel that the opposition to this bill is founded in good faith and rests upon the solid convictions of able and conscientious Senators

Mr. TOWNSEND. I agree with the Senator that there are very many conscientious Senators who are opposing this bill; and I wanted to hear their arguments as against the bill, because, as I said, I have an open mind. It is furthest from my thought to reflect upon any Senator who does not believe in this bill and who has urged legitimate argument against it. I have voted against subsidies in the past. I should vote against this subsidy if a better method were proposed and would be very glad to do so. What I am condemning is the patent attempt on the part of a few Senators to play politics and occupy very much time of the Senate on extraneous matters instead of allowing us to proceed to discuss a bill which clearly ought to be discussed in order that Senators might vote intelligently on it.

I have said this much, Mr. President, because I am convinced that it is a great matter which has been trifled with to a great extent, and that the results may be of greater importance to the country than those who have treated it lightly may now understand. I have been hoping, as I said, vainly that there would come a time, although now it is too late, when we could consider this bill and amendments to it for the purpose of perfecting it so as to accomplish what a great majority of the Members of the Senate want to accomplish.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I intended to take 5 or 10 minutes in a discussion of this bill before a vote was taken on the motion, but I am not going to take the time now. I am anxious to get a vote, and I want to express the hope that the motion to recommit will be voted down. Nothing could be accomplished by the motion. The bill could not be reconsidered by the committee before the session is over with the expectation of doing anything, so I express the hope very earnestly that the motion to recommit will be voted down.

Then I want to say this, that I do not propose to keep this bill before the Senate to delay other measures. There are important matters which ought to be considered by the Senate, and which can be considered by the Senate before we adjourn. So I am not going to use this bill as a buffer to prevent action upon those measures or to delay them.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Ladd] will make his motion to take up the filled milk bill after the disposition of this measure, and I want to say that I shall vote for his motion to displace the pending bill, and I hope the motion will be agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. The pending question is on the motion made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] to recommit the bill. The Senator now says he is going to vote for the

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand he is going to vote against the motion to recommit?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the difference, in the opinion of the Senator?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to try to explain that now.

Mr. HARRISON. What is to be gained by that?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Nothing at all, except that I do not like the idea of treating the shipping bill so entirely differently from the way we treat and have treated other important measures. If Senators desire to kill the bill, kill it in a sort of a dignified way instead of reflecting upon the committee by sending it back to the committee, apparently expressing the idea that the committee had not given the bill proper consideration, and therefore the Senate is going to reflect upon it by sending the bill back to them. The Senator of course can do just as he wants to. I hope the bill will not be recommitted. As I said when it is disposed of, I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from North Dakota to take up the filled milk bill.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator thinks, then, that a vote for the motion of the Senator from North Dakota is more dignified than a vote for the motion to recommit?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think so. Possibly I am influenced a little by personal feeling. As I said, I feel that it would be a sort of a reflection upon the committee to refer the bill back to the committee at this late hour in the session. Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think it would be wiser to have a funeral oration and some flowers?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Anybody who desires to de-liver a funeral oration is at liberty to do so. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to do it. I am trying to get through as quickly as possible.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator announced on last Saturday that he recognized that the bill was defeated; that is, that it could not be passed during the present session.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think I did; yes. The Record will show.

Mr. ROBINSON. If that was true, I want to ask the Senator from Washington why he has held this bill before the Senate for two or three days since he made that announcement and since the country has known that the bill could not pass, unless he acquiesced in keeping the bill before the Senate as a buffer?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was anxious to get a vote yesterday, but Senators desired to speak, and, of course, I could not prevent it. I did not desire to make a motion to lay on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator will recall that on last Saturday I asked unanimous consent for a vote on the motion to recommit and the Senator declined it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There was coupled w condition of some kind. I have forgotten what it was Mr. ROBINSON. No; there was no condition. The There was coupled with it a

There was an absolute request for unanimous consent for a vote on the motion to recommit. If that motion had carried, it would have enabled the Senate to proceed with the consideration of other bills, and to have discussed a large number of measures which will not be considered because of the keeping of this bill before the Senate as a buffer.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am certain I would not have objected to that if there had not been some condition attached which I have forgotten now. I was anxious to get to a vote.

I desire to propound an inquiry to the Sen-Mr. McNARY. ator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well. Mr. McNARY. Assuming that the filled milk bill shall displace the ship subsidy bill, after the disposition of the filled milk bill, does the Senator from Washington propose to make a motion that the ship subsidy bill shall be made the unfinished

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not. I do not expect to try to call this bill up any more this session.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator yield for an inquiry?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has stated that while he is going to vote against the motion to recommit, and vote for the more dignified motion presented by the Senator from North Dakota to take up the filled milk bill, and I see in the chamber now the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] also, and this would apply to him as well, in view of the fact that the President has not sent a special message asking us to pass the filled milk bill in the closing days of this Congress, but on Saturday, in a very strong message, urged appropriate legislation for the ratification of a treaty that would carry the United States into membership in a permanent international court, does not the Senator think that it would be more appropriate, if we were going to carry out the wishes of this administration, to have a motion made either to discharge the Committee on Foreign Relations if they just refused to act, or to take up this matter, and in the few remaining days consider that important matter?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not considering this matter and this program from the administration standpoint at all. The treaty to which the Senator refers has not been acted upon by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it is not before the Senate. The bill of the Senator from North Dakota has been acted upon by a committee, it is on the calendar, and ready for consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. But may I say to the Senator—Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to say frankly to the Senator that as far as I am personally concerned I have given such little time as I could to the suggestion of the President. I have not studied it carefully. My impression is that I see no objection to the proposal of the President at this time. But I am not foreclosing the judgment I may reach hereafter, upon a more careful study and consideration of the proposal; but I do hope that that will not come before the Senate before we dispose of this motion to recommit.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator know what the views of the steering committee are, including the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, with respect to the matter?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have not conferred with any member of the steering committee. If a Senator were to ask me who they are, I could not tell him; I do not know.

Mr. HARRISON. I saw the Senator from Massachusetts a moment ago, when this colloquy started, but now he is not on the floor of the Chamber.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may print in the RECORD some extracts from the testimony of Mr. Lasker relating to the difference in the cost of operating American and British ships, so as to make his view perfectly clear, as I think it has not been made clear; also a statement from a report made by Thomas Jefferson with reference to the merchant marine, and a statement prepared by a very reliable gentleman, whom I know and can vouch for, with reference to a provision in the McKinley law that is a parallel to the permanent appropriation provision in this bill; also a history of the Cunard subsidy.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 13 of the hearings Chairman Lasker in his direct testimony made the following statement:

"Private ships under the American flag must be governmentally aided, because of the higher standards of living of American labor in the shipyard and on the ship. The man who builds ships on land works in America with a higher wage; the man who mans our ship is paid more and sustained better than the foreigner. Who in America would have it different?"

At the bottom of page 33 and top of page 34 there is found the following testimony:

more and sustained better than the foreigner. Who in America would have it different?"

At the bottom of page 33 and top of page 34 there is found the following testimony:

"Mr. Lasker. I am not myself an expert on the question of the labor cost. Experts will be put on the stand who will answer that question; and because I do not want to do injustice to the subject. I have to refuse, on the plea of incompetency, to go into the details, to answer in a detailed way. But I do know this, that to-day the labor cost between Britain and the United States is closer together than it ever was before in the history of shipping. The reason that it is closer to-day is that American shipping is practically dead, and those men who are forced to go to sea are forced to take whatever wages they can get, and I think the American private shipowner will come to a time when he will be ashamed of himself at the low wages he is paying at this time.

"Mr. Hardy. As a matter of fact, the private shipowner is paying even under the British wage at this time?

"Mr. Lasker. No; that is not the fact; but you will have to cross-examine the experts when they come on as to that.

"Mr. Hardy. We will leave that to the others who know more about it. At least, my investigation prompts me to ask that question.

"Mr. Lasker. I could have prepared myself to answer it, but I had so much to do to go into the general subject. These figures have all been submitted to me, and I have read them all, but I am not able to discuss them. But there has been a difference of 25 per cent to 30 per cent, almost constant, in the wage between the American and the British ship. That difference is cut away down now; but as soon as shipping improves the American wage will immediately go up and the differential will prevail, because the Britisher was neither willing on the dot, on the one hand, nor cruel enough, on the other hand, short-sighted enough when he had the opportunity, to cut down the wage of his seamen and drive his seamen of the sea, as the American shipowne

"Mr. Lasker, No; Mr. Furuseth did not say that.
"Mr. Furuseth. I said there will be a shortage.
"Mr. Lasker, But you can answer that yourself, whether the ship-owner, with the shortage Mr. Furuseth predicts—and I accept his prediction—whether or not the shipowner will have to pay the higher wage."

On page 35 additional statements are made, as follows:

"Mr. Hardy. That razzle-dazzle made about the seaman's act and that the shipowners were about ready to quit—

"Mr. Lasker. I think that is a most misrepresented act.

"Mr. Hardy. That far we will agree. Then you will admit to-day the wages are practically the same on British and American and Norweyian ships?

"Mr. Lasker. No, sir; not on the American.

"Mr. Hardy. I thought you said privately owned ships had gotten down as low.

"Mr. LASKER. No, sir; not on the American.

"Mr. Hardy. I thought you said privately owned ships had gotten down as low.

"Mr. LASKER. No, sir; I said they had gotten down closer together. If you will read the record over when the stenographer transcribes the minutes, you will see I did not say that.

"Mr. Hardy. I did not mean you said it in the record just now; but I thought you said before they had gotten down.

"Mr. Hardy. I did not mean you seld it in the record just now; but I thought you said before they had gotten down.

"Mr. LASKER. No, sir; I said they were getting closer together.

"Mr. Hardy. How close—"Mr. LASKER. I said we will put experts on.

"Mr. Hardy. (continuing). You did not know?

"Mr. LASKER. If I did not, I will still stick to it; but we are going to put on experts."

It will be noted in all the above that the chairman dwelt upon the fact that he was not the board expert to testify on this matter and repeatedly reiterated that specially qualified experts would follow him to discuss that matter in detail. At the top of page 36 he makes his position clear, as follows:

"Mr. LASKER. You see, I do not want this cross-examination of mine on this question of subsistence to stand as the record we are making, because I have averred time and again I am not competent to give the information; but I have men here who will give you the information."

Still, it will be noted that he never failed to reiterate that a substantial wage differential did arist to give the information; but I have men here who will give you the information."

Still, it will be noted that he never failed to reiterate that a substantial wage differential did exist.

In the study submitted by the board the third paragraph, found on page 107, specifically includes higher wages as one of the disadvantages of American shipping. On page 125 the entire page is devoted to a discussion of the wage differential and the reason that at the time the hearings were held this differential was less than normal is clearly explained there.

On page 164 this is gone into in greater detail, with comparison of tables, and the entire matter of wages was dealt with in great detail in my own direct testimony, beginning on page 434 and throughout the cross-examination.

As an example of the efforts of the minority to obtain an admission that wage differentials were not great, there is found on page 296 the following question by Mr. Bankerad, which Mr. Lasker promptly denied:

following question by Mr. BANKHEAD, which Mr. Lasker promptly denied:

"Mr. BANKHEAD. Another item that you mention is higher cost of wages. As I understand it, for the present that element has been eliminated by the admission in the testimony of the chairman of the Shipping Board as a matter of comparison between Great Britain and the United States?

"Mr. LASKER. Oh. no."

This occurred during the cross-examination of Mr. Daniel H. Cox upon an entirely different subject.

upon an entirely different subject.

REPORT OF THOMAS JEFFERSON, AS SECRETARY OF STATE, TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—OFFICIAL PAPERS, DECEMBER 18, 1793.

Our navigation involves still higher considerations. As a branch of industry it is valuable, but as a resource of defense essential.

Its value as a branch of industry is enhanced by the dependence of so many other branches on it. In times of general peace it multiplies competitors for employment in transportation, and so keeps that at its proper level; and in time of war—that is to say, when those nations who may be our principal carriers shall be at war with each other if we have not within ourselves the means of transportation, our produce must be exported in belligerent vessels, at the increased expense of war freight and insurance, and the articles which will not bear that must perish on our hands.

But it is as a resource of defense that our navigation will admit neither neglect nor forbearance. The position and circumstances of the United States leave them nothing to fear on their land board and nothing to desire beyond their present rights. But on their scaboard they are open to injury, and they have there, too, a commerce which must be protected. This can only be done by possessing a respectable body of citizen seamen and of artists and establishments in readiness for shipbullding. * *

But if particular nations grasp at undue shares, and, more especially, if they selze on the means of the United States, to convert them into aliment for their own strength, and withdraw them entirely from the support of those to whom they belong, defensive and protecting measures become necessary on the part of the nation whose marine resources are thus invaded; or it will be disarmed of its defense; its productions will lie at the mercy of the nation whose harine resources are thus invaded; or other will be disarmed of its defense; its productions will be requisite to raise up others, when disgrace or or losses shall bring home to our feelings the error of having a

REPORT OF THOMAS JEFFERSON, AS SECRETARY OF STATE, TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—OFFICIAL PAPERS, FEBRUARY 1, 1791.

If regulations exactly the counterpart of those established against us would be ineffectual, from a difference of circumstances other regulations equivalent can give no reasonable ground of complaint to any nation. Admitting their right of keeping their markets to themselves, ours can not be denied of keeping our carrying trade to ourselves. And if there be anything unfriendly in this, it was in the first example.

The loss of seamen, unnoticed, would be followed by other losses in a long train. If we have no seamen our ships will be useless, consequently our ship timber, iron, and hemp; our shipbuilding will be at an end, ship carpenters go over to other nations, our young men have no call to the sea, our produce, carried in foreign bottoms, be saddled with war freight and insurance in times of war; and the history of the last 100 years shows that the nation which is our carrier has three years of war for every four years of peace. * * It is easier, as well as better, to stop this train at its entrance than when it shall have ruined or banished whole classes of useful and industrious citizens.

BOUNTY OR SUBSIDY TO FARMERS AND PLANTERS FOR THE PRODUCTION OF SUGAR IN THE M'KINLEY TARIFF ACT OF 1890.

The tariff act of October 1, 1890, generally known as the McKinley Act, provided for the free admission of all sugars not above No. 16 Dutch standard in color, thus removing to the free list an article which previously, on the grade chiefly imported, had paid a duty of about 2.24 cents per pound. To compensate for the abandonment of a protective duty for the domestically produced sugar the act further provided for 14 years for a bounty of 2 cents per pound to be paid to the producers of sugar testing not less than 90° by the polariscope, whether produced from cane, beets, sorghum, or the sap of the maple tree. On sugar testing less than 90° and not less than 80° the bounty was to be three-fourths of a cent per pound.

14 years for a bounty of 2 cents per pound to be paid to the producers of sugar testing not less than 90° by the polariscope, whether produced from cane, heets, sorghum, or the sap of the maple tree. On sugar testing less than 90° and not less than 80° the bounty was to be three-fourths of a cent per pound.

When the McKinley Tariff Act was passed the Government was confronted with the problem of a superabundant revenue. Sugar was one of the most important revenue articles in the tariff law. The annual receipts from this source had been about $55,000,000. Under the long-continued tariff protection the American domestic sugar industry had increased, but was still unable to supply the people with more than one-eighth of the domestic consumption. It was argued and agreed to by a majority of Congress that a direct bounty to the growers of sugar—the beet-sugar growers and the cane-sugar growers—would yield protection exactly as the tariff gave 1t, and would make it possible to lessen the customs revenue by placing raw sugar on the free list.

The Committee on Ways and Means therefore recommended abolition of the tariff duty and the granting of a bounty of 2 cents per pound on every pound of sugar produced in the United States.

Mr. McKinley, of Ohlo, in outlining the argument for the bounty, said that it would give protection in the most economic and effective way. Some, he added, "urged that this protection will not continue to be provided: that a Democratic Congress will refuse to make the appropriation." Fearing this, he added, "we have provided in the bill that the sum required shall be a permanent appropriation."

Representative Dunnell, of Minnesota, and other Congressmen from the States where beet-sugar growing came to be introduced argued that under the bounty or subsidy system "there may spring up a great production of sugar."

In 1890 our total imports of sugar were 2,607,113,114 pounds, upon which a duty of $53,985,874 was collected. The average rate of duty per pound of sugar was therefore 2.07 cents.

Even foes of the protective system were forced to admit that the sugar subsidy of 2 cents per pound of production to the farmers of the Middle West and to the planters of the South had justified itself by its success. Prof. F. W. Taussig, one of the foremost advocates of free trade in the United States, was one of those who acknowledged that the bounty was responsible for this increase. Professor Taussig said: "After 1890 there was a substantial gain, no doubt due in part to the effect on men's imagination of the bounty given by the McKinley tariff act. It is true that the bounty was intended to do no more, and in fact did no more, than make up for the abolition of the duty. But a bounty seems to make a greater impression than a duty—not only on the general public, but also, strange as it may seem, on the producers whose affairs are directly concerned."

It should be borne in mind that this signal instance of the successful use of a subsidy or bounty by the Government of the United States was frankly intended for the protection and encouragement of the agriculture of the Mississippi Valley region. It was a farmer's subsidy or bounty. When the McKinley tariff was supplanted by the Gorman-Wilson tariff, the farmers and planters who were raising sugar under the bounty system were not abandoned by their Government. On the contrary, the framers of the Gorman-Wilson tariff protected sugar by an ad valorem tariff duty of 40 per cent.

How can Senators of sugar-growing States that made no objection to the sugar subsidy of 1890, but welcomed it and made good use of it, object now to a subsidy to ships?

SHIP SUBSIDY AND THE CUNARD LINE—STORY OF THE REMARKABLE GROWTH OF A GREAT STEAMSHIP LINE THROUGH SUBSIDY.

(By Capt. E. K. Roden.)

In the year 1830 in the city of Hallfax, Nova Scotia, lived a man who cherished an ideal. He was a cautious business man and, in fact, represented the honorable East India Co., so that he had much to do with shipping.

The man's name was Samuel Cunard and his ideal was to operate a line of steamers across the Atlantic. Up to this time, of course, most of the trade was carried in sailing ships, but in 1838 the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, who at that time arranged overseas postal contracts, came to the decision that steamships had become so reliable that they were more suitable for the conveyance of mails than the adling above accordingly invited for the conveyance of mails than the adling above accordingly invited for the establishment of a regular fortnightly service between Liverpool, Halfax, and Boston, and Mr. Gunard had his opportunity. Armed with a letter of introduction to Mr. George Burns, a shipowner engaged in the coasting trade, who in turn introduced his partner, Mr. David McIeve, of Liverpool. In this way commenced the association of the North Atlantic trade.

The trio secured the contract on the basis of a subsidy of $20,000 per annum and formed a company with the subscribed capital of the Choic. Before they had gothen very far with their linas, however, the contract was modified so that they had to provide four ships adhere to faced saling afters, the term of the agreement being for seven peans, villy 4, 1840, the Britannia salied from Liverpool with G3 saloon passengers and thus inaugurated a service which has probably done more than any other single agency to bind together the origins of the provide states of the contract was modified so that they had to provide four ships after the contract was modified so that they had to provide four ships after the contract was modified so that they had to provide four ships after the contract was modified so that they had to provide four ships after the contract was modified so that they had to provide four ships after the contract was modified so that they had to provide four ships after the contract was modified so that they had to provide four ships after the contract was modified so that they had to provide four ships after the contract was modified so that they had to provide the contract was modified so that they had to provide the contract was modified so that they had to provide the contract was a the contract was a contr

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I was willing that we should have a vote upon the question of recommitting the ship subsidy bill, but the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Townsend] prevented that vote from being had by a further discussion of the question, and in his speech charged that those who opposed the bill were playing politics, and attempting to deceive the people. I want the Record to be kept straight as we go along. I want Senators who are exceedingly sensitive to take notice that that is a reflection upon Senators on this side and on the other side who opposed this bill, and the Senator from Michigan could have been called to order, but nobody called him to order. I believe in free speech, myself, and I think that each Senator ought to be able to take care of himself in debate in this body—

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. And I was willing to wait and have my say in reply to the Senator-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HEFLIN. But I just want to remind Senators on the other side who are always keenly on the alert to prevent certain subjects from being mentioned in this Chamber that they were sleeping on the job this morning. Now I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Of course, if I said what the Senator says I said, I owe an apology to the Senate, and will make it. not intend any such thing, and I am sure I said no such thing. I said that much that is said on the floor of the Senate is for political purposes-to deceive the people. I did not apply that directly to those who are opposed to the bill, as I said to the Senator from Utah when he rose that that was not intended for them, because I admitted that much that was said-in fact, all that was said-by Senators who were arguing this question was given my most careful and earnest attention, because I was looking for light, looking for arguments to be brought forth on both sides. I was condemning the fact that much of this discussion has not been for the purpose of throwing light on this bill, but has been an indulging in extraneous matters. That is what I said and that is what I intended to convey.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HEFLIN, I yield. Mr. ROBINSON, It i It is true that the Senator during the course of his remarks charged that Senators had attempted to deceive the American people. That statement was distinctly heard by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass] and by other It is a fact that the statement constitutes a reflection upon the Senate.

There is no doubt about the language being Mr. HEFLIN. used, Mr. President, but the Senator explains now that he meant no reflection. He said we were playing politics. I am sure the notes will bear out my understanding of what the Senator said.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator deny that the Senator himself has been playing politics?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; I deny that I have been playing politics. I assert that I have been doing my patriotic duty against one of the greatest combines that has ever appeared in the country-the Shipping Trust.

Mr. President, I have served for some time in Congress, and I have never seen such a propaganda carried on as those who would profit by this ship bill have carried on. Newspaper space galore has been devoted to carrying on a propaganda all over the country, trying to shape public opinion in favor of this ship subsidy bill. Nobody can deny that. There never has been anything like it, and the men who have fought this ship subsidy have stood out boldly, fearlessly, and ably, defending their position against a combination that is colossal in this country.

Money is no object, and why should it be with these people? If this bill should pass, the Government would turn over to them as a gift twenty-eight hundred million dollars' worth of ships. Why should they not spend a few millions to get a gift like that? Why should they not be willing to buy certain newspapers to poison public sentiment in order to pull off a deal like

I am not going to speak at length on this ship subsidy bill, because it is already dead. The able and genial Congressman, Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi, tells a story about a brother of his who lived at Greenville, Miss., who was a doctor. He was sent for one night to come to see a negro who was sick on the other side of the river from him. The negroes always called him "Umphers" instead of "Humphreys." He went down to the ferry and hollered, and the negro ferryman on the other side answered, and recognizing Doctor Humphreys's voice, said, "Is that you, Doctor "Umphers"? He said, "Yes."

"Yes."

The ferryman said, "Albert is already dead." [Laughter.]

I told that story to the Senator from Washington [Mr. He came in here last Friday wearing a Jones I on Saturday. flaming red necktie; Saturday he came with a white tie, and he is properly robed to-day. He has on a black tie, mourning for this miserable measure that has gone to its long, last sleep. [Laughter.] Still, he does not want the corpse dismissed; he does not want it to be referred back to the committee. not take it out of the Senate Chamber? It is already dead.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And smelling bad.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the papers that have been carrying on this propaganda and criticizing me have criticized others over here who have dared to fight against opening the Public Treasury to the men who compose the Shipping Trust.

I felt that I owed it to my constituents and to the people of the country who do not believe in this sort of legislation to give some reason for the faith that is in me.

Do you know what has been done in the sale of some of these ships? Bids have been asked and some sales made, we are told. Do you know what stipulations have been made regarding the sale of the ships? It has been stipulated, I am informed, that the man who bought them was told that he could not operate them, but had to dismantle them. What do you think of that, Senators? If the American people knew the real truth they would be astounded to learn that people who wanted to buy ships, when they came up to bid and buy were told "You can not operate this ship in competition with other ships now in the shipping business, but you will have to dismantle it." Can anybody under Heaven defend such a course as that? Is there a business man in the Republic who would condone or indorse such a thing as that? Where is he? Here is the Government in possession of the greatest merchant marine in the world except that of Great Britain, and we say we want to dispose of some of the ships and we advertise them for sale. We say they are splendid vessels, built under the direction of the great genius Schwab; they are masterful ships, all of them, and are for sale. They are to be sold on a certain day. Come ye who want to buy ships-and here they come. When they arrive they are told "Now, you want these two ships or these four or six ships?" "Yes; I want them. I am going into the shipping business." "Oh. no; you can not do that. No; you can not operate them in competition with other ships. You can buy them, but you must dismantle them or tie them up to the shore and let them Can anybody excuse such a deal as that? Then, some Senators stand up here and undertake to condemn us for daring to rise on the floor of the Senate and oppose such an unbusinesslike deal as that.

I understand that Mr. Lasker has sold for $2,100 ships which cost the Government $600,000 and $800,000. Can anyone excuse such conduct as that? It is said that is the best price we can get. Why sell them until conditions get better? Why not hold them until normal times return and prosperity shall appear again in the Republic? Why force the ships upon a dead market and put such restrictions about the sale that the man who buys the ships can not operate them, but must dismantle them? Why give away for $2,100 ships that cost $600,000 and $800,000?

I heard a story about one of these ships to the effect that a man bought one of these Government ships over near Alexandria for $1,600. A few days thereafter lightning struck it and set it afire, and he recovered from the insurance company $25,000 for damage done to the ship by fire. If we are not going to be permitted to use them, it would be a good idea just to buy the ships and put them out somewhere with some sort of instrument on them that would draw lightning, and let lightning strike them and have insurance on them and make money out of them in that way. That would at least be more profitable to the buyer than dismantling them.

If Mr. Lasker will not allow the purchasers to operate the ships, but will compel the purchasers to dismantle them, where is the wisdom in making the investment? Then we are told that we can not get anything for the ships. Of course not, under those conditions. Suppose a man should advertise a dozen plow mules for sale and farmers should come up to buy those nules, and at the time they were bidding on them they were told that they could not plow them or drive them to a vehicle, but that they must kill them. What would they give for those mules? They would not give anything. Yet we are told that the stipulation is that "if you buy these ships you can not use them in the shipping trade, but you must dismantle And in the same breath we are told that the Government can not get anything for the ships.

What shipping business is it that is better than the Government, and with which the Government's ships are not allowed to go into competition? Who is it that holds this power that causes those in authority to so handle the Government's business that the Government will not conflict with other business or compete with other business and forces the Government's business to go to wreck? What strange influence in the Government is there that can bring about such a thing as that?

Why, Mr. President, now it is said by some Senators that we are going to turn our shipping business over to foreign countries. Who is doing the shipping business now? American shipping interests? No; foreign countries. With whom would we be in competition if we sold these ships to American buyers who wanted to use them in the shipping trade? We would be in competition mainly with foreign ships. Why not do that in order to make somebody desire to buy our ships to either get them out of the business or to use them in the trade? Who is going to buy when we will not permit them to use the ships in competition with foreign ships? Who is going to buy ships when they are compelled not to use them but to dismantle them? Nobody. It seems to me that if we would put these ships actively into the shipping business we would cause the shipping interests that were being injured by our activities to desire to buy our ships and put the Government out of business as a competitor.

Mr. President, there is one other thought I want to suggest this morning. I am not going to delay a vote on the question because there are other matters to be attended to this week, and I have no desire to delay the vote on the motion to recom-The sooner we can dispose of the ship subsidy bill the better. One thought is that it is said that those in the South who oppose the measure are against their own interests. That is not true. Anything that is good for America is good for the The South wants to do the thing that is right and just, the thing that is fair to all the people. All we ask in the South is the same consideration that is shown to other sections. We want a fair deal for all the people, and therefore we are against the ship subsidy.

They tell us that the only way we can have our barge lines run, because they have not yet got on a paying basis, is by the passage of this bill. That is not true. The only way that we can have these ships run until the lines are put on a paying basis is by Government aid. That is what we are doing now. We are told that if we turn these ships over to the Shipping Trust they would operate them and continue the barge line on the Mississippi River and down at New Orleans and Mobile. Why, Mr. President, it stands to reason that if they are not paying the private concerns that got them would stop the lines immediately. Anybody with common sense knows that, but the Government, desiring to build up the shipping trade on these new lines here at home, sees that this thing can be accomplished by Government aid just as we have extended aid to the farmers on the arid lands of the West, just as we have aided farmers to buy grain in the drought-stricken sections of the West. The Government can do it at a very small cost and help out until we get things on a paying basis. We are appropriating money for that purpose now. That is the only hope we have in the South, to have these lines continued until they do get on a paying basis, and they will soon be on a paying basis. The other plan would, I fear, kill them and put them out of business

Now, one other thought, Mr. President, and that is in reply to a suggestion that has been made by certain Senators on the other side of the Chamber who have discussed the question that we were not prepared when the war came on; that we had to rely on British ships to convoy our troops to the battle field. That is true. It was said that we did not have at the beginning of the war a merchant fleet to accompany our battle fleet. That is true. But we have it now, have we not? We have the greatest fleet in the world except that of Great Britain, and here is a solemn, persistent effort to dispose of it, to practically give it away; not part of it, but all of it.

We have even been told that the world is in an unsettled condition; that war is liable to break out in Europe; that somebody may do something to draw us into such a war; and that we would not be prepared. But I submit to those who make that argument that they, by the sale of these ships, are fixing to put us in an unprepared condition. Suppose we sell the ships which cost the Government $3,000,000,000, and war should come, and Great Britain should not be in position to convoy our ships, and no other country over there would be in a position to do that, and we had sold all of our shipswould we have to do? We would have to turn right around and again appropriate $3,000,000,000 to build up a merchant fleet to accompany our battleships abroad. I suppose when that war was over somebody would then be ready to sell the ships for a song and rob the Government of hundreds of millions of dollars

Mr. President, in Atlanta, Ga., a few days ago, the farmers, merchants, bankers, and business men generally met in a great conference to discuss ways and means of combating the boll weevil. He is now called the "billion-dollar bug." He has prevented cotton production in the Cotton Belt of the United States. Farming is unprofitable. Farmers are quitting the farms. Farmers can not cope with the ravages of the boll weevil. Farmers are leaving the farms and going to the cities to work in industrial plants. Something has to be done to help our people, to encourage them, to safeguard them in the production of cotton. Suppose we should propose here a bill giving a subsidy of $25 a bale for every bale of cotton that we produced in the year 1923. I know a lot of Senators, I think, who would faint right on the spot. They would say, "The idea of giving these cotton farmers money out of the purse of the Government to carry on their own private business!"

That is exactly what is proposed. It is proposed not only to sell ships which cost from $600,000 to $800,000 for $2,100 each, but it is proposed under this bill that we shall pay $50,000,000 a year to those who buy them, in order that they may profitably operate them. Think of that, Senators! Fifty million dollars a year! Do Senators know how much the upkeep ships would cost? It would cost not more than $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 a year. The world is in an unsettled condition. Suppose we merely keep these ships and maintain them in good order at a cost of $15,000,000, or we will say $20,000,000, if Senators please; then, at least, they will still be our ships. It makes no difference what may happen, we would still have this merchant fleet. The fact that we have them will compel the ships of other nations to give us a better freight rate across the ocean; the fact that we have them will make other nations keep off of us, maybe. If war should come, we should have those ships to accompany our battle fleet wher ever it might have to go in defense of American rights and

Mr. President, suppose it should cost us $20,000,000 a year for the upkeep of those ships. In the course of five years we should have spent $100,000,000, but we should still own our fleet of ships. Suppose this bill should pass, we will lose our fleet; perhaps in 60 days the whole fleet would be gone and the $3,000,000,000 worth of ships would be given over to the Ship Trust for $200,000,000. In five years we shall have given out of the Treasury to the Ship Trust $50,000,000 more than they paid altogether for all the fleet which costs us $3,000,000,000. Yet Senators are saying that this is a grave question, that we ought to have a vote on it, and that we ought not to talk about other things while the bill is up for consideration, but just let them pass it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield. Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The senior Senator from Florida [Mr. Fletcher] informs me that a citizen has made an offer to give a bond to the United States Government to keep all these ships in repair and ready for use at $10,000,000 per year and not for $15,000,000 or $20,000,000, as the Senator from Alabama has suggested.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for that suggestion.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the Senator has suggested something which has not been brought out heretofore. He has referred to the fact that the maintenance of the ships will provide an auxiliary to our Navy in time of war. Does the Senator know how much we are paying annually to keep our naval craft in repair and in condition?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know the exact figures.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is a good deal more than $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 per year. So, on the theory that we are to pay to keep our naval craft in condition for use in time of war, why would it not be cheaper for us, as the Senator has stated, to keep our merchant fleet as an auxiliary to the Navy $10,000,000 a year rather than pay a subsidy of $30,000,000 a year?

Mr. HEFLIN. That argument is sound, Mr. President.

Mr. McKELLAR. Or rather than to sell them.

WALSH of Massachusetts. Or rather than to sell them

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama allow me to interrupt him for just a moment?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator.

The Senator from Massachusetts went a Mr. FLETCHER little further I think than my observation to him might warrant. I have assurances from a citizen that he can give a bond to take care of these ships, if we were to tie them up for a year, at a cost of $10,000,000 and keep in repair and ready for immediate the statement of the second statement for immediate use at least 10 per cent of them. Not to keep in shipshape the entire number, but to take care of them and have them tied up or anchor them in fresh water, and then keep in condition and ready for use at least 10 per cent of them at a cost of $10,000,000 a year.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank the Senator from Florida for his suggestion.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama vield to me?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I have been advised by persons who are somewhat familiar with this matter that if the proper place is provided-and the Government has the proper place-the ships may be stored and properly cared for for $5,000,000 per annum, so that when the Senator from Alabama indicates that the cost for that purpose would be $20,000,000 a year he is entirely too liberal to the Shipping Board.

There is not any difficulty, it seems to me, in keeping the ships in good condition for $5,000,000 or thereabouts per annum; but, of course, with the present Shipping Board, with the multitude of officials, incompetent as most of them are, the cost to the Government of their doing nothing excepting to spend money will be greatly in excess of $5,000,000 per annum. Perhaps the overhead will be from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000 per annum, because of the large amount the Government pays in extravagant salaries paid by the Shipping Board to the numerous supernumeraries that now afflict the board.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I thank all of the Senators for their very valuable suggestions. I was trying to be very liberal in the amount that I fixed as the cost of the upkeep of the ships, but the distinguished ranking Democrat on the Committee on Commerce, the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. Fletcher], has stated to us, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has suggested, that a worthy man is ready to give bond that he will keep these ships in good order and in readiness for use for the sum of $10,000,000 a year. Mr. President, at that figure these ships could be kept by the Government for 10 years for the sum of $100,000,000-think of that-and we should still own the ships that cost the Government three thousand million dollars. We would only pay out, then, alto-gether $100,000,000; and yet if this bill passes we shall not only lose this fleet but we shall have paid to the shipping interests out of the Public Treasury by that time $500,000,000.

Mr. President, I submit we ought to safeguard the public in this matter: I submit that this is a matter that affects vitally the whole American people; I submit that there are two sides to this question: One is the side that the interests of the American people are upon, and the other the side of advantage to be given to those who are to profit by the ship subsidy-those who are to make millions and hundreds of millions out of the deal. Is it any wonder that these people are moving heaven and earth to pass this bill? Is it any wonder that editorials which fairly sizzle are written against those of us who have participated in the delay of a vote upon this bill? They have characterized us in the most bitter fashion as tying up and hamstringing the Senate against the passage of this ship subsidy bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President-

I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER, I should like the Senator to observe that statistics show that in 1921 20 per cent of the world's tennage, representing the shipping of every nation, was tied up at docks all over the world; in 1922 the freights were lower than they have been heretofore in almost a century, and tonnage likewise was tied up all over the world, and of course there was no demand immediately for ships. Under such conditions, is this the time now to force on the market the ships that we own?

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank the Senator for the suggestion. just remarked a moment ago, Mr. President, that this is no time to sell these ships. Why should that be done? I know of a half-dozen men in the South who did not sell their cotton when it went down to 10 cents in 1920; they held on to it: they were men of means and able to hold on to the crop of 1920, 1921, and that of 1922, and now cotton is bringing about 30 cents. Those men who were able to do that are going to get the benefit of a 80-cent price for their cotton; but those who were forced to sell because of the deflation policy were crushed, their business ruined, their homes broken up, and many of them went insane, and others killed themselves because of the deflation crash.

Mr President, the Government is able to hold these ships. If we are able to give to profiteers $450,000,000 a year off of the taxes they were paying, if we are able to give to the big income-tax payers $90,000,000 a year off the taxes they were paying, and if we were able to give to war contractors under questionable contracts-in hundreds of cases-$700,000,000, it looks to me that we are able to hold on a while to the ships that cost us three thousand million dollars until the market is good and we can make a better deal for the American people.

Mr. President, Henry Ford has submitted an offer for Muscle Shoals. He proposes to make fertilizer there and sell it at about half what it costs to-day to the farmers of America. The farmers are in a bad fix, and naturally we should be doing great good if we would do this thing for them. I do not see any of the newspapers writing editorials that bristle and sting, saying that action ought to be had on the Muscle Shoals offer of Henry Ford, and urging Congress to turn the project over to Henry Ford so as to bless and benefit with cheap fertilizer millions of American farmers. Oh, no; we do not see that, but we see them day after day writing strong, powerful, pungent editorials against us for daring to stand in the way of this deal that will give to the ship trust three thousand million dollars of the Government's money representing the greatest merchant fleet in the world, save that of Great Britain, and will pay them out of the Public Treasury $50,000,-

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President—
Mr. NORBECK. If the Senator will permit me, I should like
Mr. NORBECK. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to suggest a correction in his statement. The Senator stated that Henry Ford had agreed to manufacture and sell fertilizer at half its present price. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact, which will be verified if he will look at the contract submitted, that Henry Ford agrees to nothing but to-manufacture fertilizer at cost plus.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; 8 per cent profit. His chief engineer, Mr. Mayo, was the man who said before our committee that it was his [Mr. Ford's] purpose to manufacture it at about half its present cost. But I am just using that, Mr. President, to show how the various currents work. When the plain people, the masses, are to be benefited these handy editorial writers do not sit up late at night and advocate such measures, but when there is presented some concrete proposal behind which there is big money, where a big deal is in sight, and where the Public Treasury is to be opened and certain people's arms run into the Treasury up to the armpits, then it is that these editorials fairly sizzle in advocacy of the measure or in criticism of those in Congress who oppose it.

I have no patience with this talk about the minority not I have no patience with this talk about the minority not? I having the right to filibuster a bill to death. Why not? I think that if the minority is honestly convinced that a measure is wrong, that a measure is rotten, that somebody is about to put over a deal that would work great injury to the American people, it is at liberty to use any tactics at its command to defeat the bill.

want to read here, Mr. President, a clipping from a paper published in Washington, called Labor:

SHIP SUBSIDY PASSES THE HOUSE WITH VOTE OF LAME DUCKS.

On the final roll call the bill had a majority of only 24. The administration majority in the House is 169. Of those who voted for the bill 72 were Republican Members who were beaten in the year's primaries or elections or who retired in the face of defeat. Many of these Members were called to the White House for interviews with President Harding on the subsidy policy just before the final vote.

Mr. President, the White House is always the city of refuge to the lame-duck brigade. When the administration has a measure in which it is much interested, usually the lame duck. defeated by his constituents at home, turns his eye wistfully toward the White House and moves steadily in that direction until he can have a conference with the dispenser of Federal patronage, and when the President shakes his hand heartily and tells him that he ought to be taken care of it produces a smile on the face of the lame duck, and as he finds that he has won favor with the President he readjusts his crutches and smiles blandly. He leaves, comes back to the House, or the Senate, maybe, and enthusiastically votes to put the administration measure over. I do not say that they would do that; I am just supposing a case.
I want to raise the question, What right have these men to saddle upon the American people such a colossal thing as this? These ships, I repeat, cost the American people three thousand million dollars. What right have a few men who have been repudiated by the people at home to stand in the Senate in the closing hours of the session and vote to take away from us a merchant fleet that cost three thousand million dollars and turn it over to the Shipping Trust, and as soon as the gavel falls, maybe, receive appointments, every one of them, at the hands of the President?

Mr. President, I assert here that I believe that if you would take out of the ranks of those who favor this bill those who were defeated at the polls last year, this bill would be defeated on a straight vote of those who now hold commissions from the American people. Why should these men whose terms are to expire next Sunday at 12 o'clock, and who are going to be appointed maybe to positions-fat jobs-by the President, be permitted in the closing hours of this session to use their votes in putting over this bill which will dispose of our ships at a loss to the Government of $2,800,000,000? Why do not some of these papers criticize them? Why do not some of these papers criticize those who are urging that this bill be jammed through the Senate under the circumstances?

A new Congress begins next Sunday. That is not long; and if this bill is a meritorious one, why not submit it to that Congress, to people who come fresh from their States and their districts with commissions from the people, and let them decide what policy they will adopt in handling this $3,000,000,000 American fleet; let them decide whether they will give away that fleet to the Ship Trust; let them decide whether they will pay the Ship Trust a cash subsidy of $50,000,000 a year to operate these ships?

Mr. President, it is the most ridiculous proposition that has been proposed in a long time. The idea of so restricting the sale of these ships that private individuals must dismantle them and can not operate them in order that some big concern may them all together, and selling the ships to them for $200,-000,000, and then paying them $50,000,000 a year out of the Treasury to operate them! Is it not ridiculous? If we were to say to you that you should pay the farmer to produce cotton under boll-weevil conditions, you would say that was paternalism; you would say that was socialism; but it is all right to open the Treasury to the Ship Trust and take out $50,000,000 a year, and pay them to run ships that you are practically giving to them.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I want to submit that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] has made strong arguments against this bill; and he and the Senator from Florida [Mr. Fletcher] have a plan here that will take the place of this subsidy bill, and under which we can operate profitably this great merchant fleet. We do not have to do it the way that the trust wants it done. Of course, pressure is brought to bear to sell these ships for virtually nothing, and then pay the people who buy them for almost nothing to operate them. Of course, there is great propaganda behind that; but the Senator from Tennessee has a plan and the Senator from Florida has a plan that will enable us to operate these ships to the advantage of the American people, to the best advantage of our people.

The Senator from Tennessee has pointed out, Mr. President, that a concern in his State at Memphis, Tenn., wanted a ship to carry some cottonseed cake to Europe. They wired the Senator from Tennessee to get in touch with the Shipping They wired the Board, to get a ship for that purpose. The Senator from Tennessee took up the matter with the board. They told the Sen ator from Tennessee to take it up with a British concern; that the British could handle it cheaper than they could. Did that look as if they were trying to get business for our ships?

Right in that connection, I want to quote the testimony of Mr. Lasker, the chairman of the Shipping Board. In his testi-mony before the House committee, he said in substance—

We did not try to get business.

Do Senators get the full significance of that? Couple these two together, Senators. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Mc-Kellar] asked for a ship; and instead of sending the ship and going into business in competition with the British ships and other ships and inspiring those nations with the desire to get our ships out of the way by buying them and paying a good price, they did not offer to go into competition with them, but told him to take up the matter with a British concern and left our ships standing idle. Did that look as though they were trying to do business for America? Not much.

'Mr. Lasker, did you try to do this or that?" "No; we did not try to get business."

Oh, Mr. President, the argument that we can not use these ships, the argument that we can not get business, falls flat. Where is the argument contained in it? They say, "We falled." "Well, have you tried?" They say, "No; we have not tried."
"Well, how do you know you can not get business?" These are the common-sense thoughts that come to people who look into this matter with the desire to get at the truth.

Not only that. You are providing in this bill to loan money to the Ship Trust out of the Government's Treasury at 2 per cent; and yet I saw this Republican Senate vote down two amendments to limit the rediscount rate to the country banks in America to 5 per cent. I saw them vote down two amend-ments—my amendments, both of them—to limit the rediscount rate to 6 per cent. Here they are, with a majority, including lame ducks, wanting to vote for this bill that will not only give our merchant fleet to the Ship Trust, that will not only pay them a subsidy of about $50,000,000 a year to run the ships, but that will open the Treasury to them and loan them money at 2 per cent.

Senators, if we could assemble the American people in these galleries and let them know what is going on here under this administration, there would not be enough of you left over there to wad a shotgun. This is the climax. All these other big schemes have gone through. This is the last one on the calendar; and a great effort is being made, in the closing hours, to force it through by the aid of lame ducks in the two Houses, men going out, men disappointed, maybe, some of them, maybe disgruntled, maybe sore with their constituents, about to be lodged in nice, cozy places in the city of Washington under Executive appointments, to be taken care of in the future, done with their legislative careers. They marshal them in the closing hours of this session to put over a bill, the most obnoxious that has been up in Congress since I have been a Member of it, and yet they are criticizing me and my colleague, and criticizing the Republicans on the other side who dare to oppose this scheme!

Mr. President, what right have we to throw away $3,000,000,000 of the people's money? I was elected here as one of the trustees of the American people, as one of the ambassadors from a sovereign State—as Senator Morgan, of my State, used to call a Senator-to safeguard the public interest. I took an oath to do that when I entered this Chamber. I am trying to-day to keep that oath. I am fighting to guard the Treasury against those who would pillage and plunder it. I am fighting to keep for the American people a fleet of merchant ships that cost $3,000,000,000.

I am fighting to keep from opening the Public Treasury to the Ship Trust to borrow money at 2 per cent, when the farmers can not get it at 5 per cent and the country bankers and the country merchants can not get it at 5 per cent. I am fighting against this special privilege that is sought to be jammed through Congress in the closing hours. I am fighting for the American people, not fighting for Wall Street. I do not represent Wall Street or the Ship Trust agents in Wall Street, who are interested in the passage of this bill; but I am trying, as are my colleagues and those Republicans who are voting with us, to prevent the passage of this measure that outrages every idea of Americanism; that, it seems to me, turns over millions and hundreds of millions to a favored few at the cost and expense of the many.

I am against it, Mr. President. I am in favor of a merchant marine. I voted to help build this merchant marine. We have a merchant marine. Senators on the other side are undertaking to barter it away for a song. I want to hold it for the present, keep it up, sell it if we must when times are good and when we can get a good price and a fair deal for the American people.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I understand that the question before the Senate arises upon a motion to recommit the pending measure. I am opposed to that motion, and I hope, sir, that it will not prevail. I am opposed to any motion which tends to deprive Senators of a fair chance to vote this measure up or vote it down; but, since it is fairly obvious to everybody that we are not to have that chance, I wish to take this oppor-tunity to record myself as being in favor of the ship subsidy bill and as ready to vote for its passage.

The question which underlies the ship subsidy bill is a great public question. It is just such a question as may with pro-priety divide parties and groups of thinking men. Underlying it are two different economic conceptions, and there is plenty of room for intelligent difference of opinion respecting its merits, and any Senator or anybody else who says that there is only one side to the question or undertakes to assert with authority which is the right side is merely closing his mind and stopping his ears.

I am not overlooking the confident assertion that the people of this country are opposed to the measure and have so recorded themselves. I deny the proposition. It is one of those assertions which people make to bolster up with a fancied authority their own unsupported opinion. I might just as well claim a popular mandate to vote for the bill, for during the campaign I came out strongly in favor of this measure, and the ticket upon which I had a place received at least a decisive majority

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator a question in that connection '

Mr. PEPPER. I yield. Mr. HARRISON. The Senator's majority was how much? Mr. HARRISON. Mr. PEPPER. I do not remember exactly, Mr. President; I think, some 350,000 as against the Democratic contestant and perhaps 218,000 or 220,000 as against five or six contestants.

Mr. HARRISON. It was some 150,000 majority, was it not?

Mr. PEPPER. It was well over 200,000.

Mr. HARRISON. By how much did Harding carry the State of Pennsylvania two and a half years ago?

Mr. PEPPER. I do not recall.

Mr. HARRISON. Some four or five hundred thousand, was It not?

Mr. PEPPER. I think so. May I ask the Senator what inference he desires to draw from this interesting statistical interruption?

Mr. HARRISON. That the Senator in his race, coming out for the ship subsidy, did not maintain the normal Republican majority, it is quite apparent.

Mr. PEPPER. I had understood that gentlemen had gone so far on this floor as to question the right of voting of those who were defeated. If we are going on to discuss the relative weight of the votes of those who were elected by reduced majorities I do not see where the thing is going to end.

Mr. HARRISON. If that were true there would not be any Republican votes, because all Republicans had reduced majorities in the last election.

Mr. PEPPER. On the contrary, Mr. President, if that were the rule, my colleague and I would be entitled to about 15 or 20 votes, because our majority was considerably larger than a whole lot of Democratic majorities all rolled up together. can not reason that way, and the attempt to do so is an illustration of one of the things to which I wish to advert in the course of my brief remarks.

They tell us that the farmers are against this measure. deny that there is any such solidarity of agricultural opinion as some of the volunteer representatives of the farmers choose to assert. I live in an agricultural community. I represent a State that stands near the top of the agricultural column, though Senators in this Chamber sometimes forget it. I find the farmers' vote is singularly thoughtful and intelligent, and for every farmer who can be found to favor the continued ownership and operation of these ships by the Government at a loss, in order that favorable rates may be given to shippers, you can find the farmer who thinks such a policy unsound, and therefore necessarily short lived, and who thinks that the really great assurance of reasonable rates is to be found in the free competition of lines of ships privately owned and privately controlled.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President-The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. With reference to the attitude of the farmers toward the ship subsidy, I hold in my hand resolutions of all of the great farm organizations in the United States, including those in Pennsylvania-there is a local grange in the Senator's State-and all of the organized farmers of the United States are certainly opposed to the ship subsidy. I will present these to the Senator now if he desires; if not, I want to put them in the RECORD at the conclusion of his remarks.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the Senator may either insert them in the RECORD now or when he pleases, as far as I am concerned. I think we are all familiar with the situation in which the heads of organizations undertake to speak in tones of authority respecting the sentiments and views of the great mass of those whom they claim as constituents, and we also know that when the test comes it is usually found that the organizers and leaders and promoters of such organizations have spoken without authority and do not receive the anticipated support.

Mr. BROOKHART. Is that true of the chambers of commerce in their support of the ship subsidy?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I pay very little attention to organized propaganda for or against any of these measures; and I do believe that in a very large percentage of cases the confident assertions, either by chambers of commerce, or farmers organizations, or labor organizations, or any other organized groups, that their constituents are all of one mind on these great public questions are assertions not justified by the facts.

However that may be, Mr. President, we are not to have a chance to vote upon this great public question, because a minority of Senators feel justified in making such a use of unlimited debate in this body as makes a vote impossible. They seem to feel some necessity for justifying their course, and I have listened for days and weeks to all manner of justification, or attempted justification, for the filibuster.

Some Senators have said that this is an extraordinary measure, and a fillbuster against it is justified for that reason. Extraordinary in what sense, Mr. President? They say because it contemplates the making of long-time contracts, and that these will involve appropriations year after year from which we may not escape. I might as well attempt to filibuster against an appropriation bill on the ground that in it are many items which commit us, morally and as a matter of common sense, to recurring appropriations year after year of equal or greater amounts.

Other Senators say that we must not bring this measure to a vote because the President has appealed for a decision. Legislative action in response to Executive suggestion is consonant with our whole scheme of government.

Mr. HARRISON and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair. The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator's last suggestion apply to the message which came in Saturday in regard to our entrance into a permanent international court?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, my proposition is that the fact that the President has requested action is no sufficient reason for delaying action, and the fact that the President has requested action upon the international court proposals is not only not a reason for delaying but it is a reason which I would recognize as a reason for expediting action.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree with the Senator as to that. I am perfectly willing, and I think this side generally is willing, to help to expedite it, and I have never heard anyone oppose the ship subsidy simply because the President had asked us for a decision.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, gentlemen draw different inferences from what they hear. My inference from what I have heard in this Chamber during the course of the debate has been that there was an attempt to inflame the minds of Senators or of the public against the suggestion of the President in favor of decision by this body, and my conviction, the conviction of one man, is that the President, in appealing for a decision, has spoken the voice of the American people. can ignore popular opinion for a time in this body, but we can not do it for a long time.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President-

Mr. FLETCHER. Before the Senator passes from the other subject, I would like to make a suggestion on that point, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. PEPPER. I will yield to the Senator from Iowa, and then yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BROOKHART. Is it not true that the policy of the President was that Congress should postpone action on this measure until after the election for fear of the result of the election?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, that is not my policy. I am here as an elected Member, carrying what I might justly claim to be the mandate of my State to vote for this measure. I am not one of those whose right to speak or vote on this question can be challenged, and I am of opinion that the merit of the controversy is on the side of those who say that, while the Constitution stands as it is, Senators must function in this body in accordance with their constitutional rights and the operation of their own consciences, and that it is an unworthy thing to criticize them for the discharge of their senatorial duty in the premises.

I do not know what new Senators would do on a question of this sort. I do not know what the attitude would be of a Senator from Vermont, or a Senator from New York, Senator from Maryland, or a Senator from the State of Washington, but I do know that if they voted against this measure, they would be voting against a measure which is plainly and obviously in the interest of their own constituents.

yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I rose to ask the Senator to yield at the point where he mentioned objections being raised to the bill by reason of the permanent appropriation provision. I wanted to ask the Senator whether he would favor the amendment proposed by the committee, to strike out of the House bill the provision for annual appropriations, inserting in another section of the bill a provision striking out authorization, and making it a permanent appropriation. Does the Senator feel that we could vote here now for a permanent appropriation of $30,000,000 a year, for 10 years at least, with a probability of it being 15 years? Whatever we may feel with regard to Whatever we may feel with regard to the subsidy, I would like to ask the Senator if he feels that Congress would be justified in voting a permanent appropriation of this large amount of money, without any control annually by Congress, as in the case of all other departments or bureaus?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I think we might as well face the fact that we are confronted, when we consider this bill, by a great question of policy which has in it a measure of permanency. I do not think it makes a very great deal of difference whether the suggestion of the Senator from Florida is acted upon or whether we actually bind ourselves to pay the subsidies which are necessary to enable sales to be made in a way advantageous to the Government. I think many of these things which have been discussed are plays upon words. The question is, on the one hand, a subsidized merchant marine, or, upon the other, the sinking of the ships or the scrapping of the ships or the continued running of the ships at public expense.

That is the question.

But, Mr. President, why not be honest with ourselves in dealing with such a subject as the filibuster? Why not honestly admit, one with another, that as long as a filibuster is permissible under our rules there will be a filibuster on any and every conceivable subject whenever circumstances are such as to give it a chance of success? It is inevitable that this shall be so, because Senators will never agree as to the circumstances under which a filibuster is justifiable or unjustifiable. As long as our rules are what they are we shall have, Mr. President, the substitution of irresponsible talk for the acid test of recorded votes. As long as our rules stand unchanged the people's business will not be transacted whenever an opportunity occurs to block it by irresponsible and protracted utterance. Until we, as a Senate sitting to discharge legislative functions as distinguished from those in which we sit as a council of ambassadors from the sovereign States, are permitted to set a limit to our debating and to enable the majority to function in bringing questions to a vote, just so long must we be content to incur the censure and something like contempt of those who speak in the name of common sense.

One of the worst things that characterizes a filibuster is its injury to the dignity and morale of the Senate. When a Senator is speaking on a cause that is near his heart, he may not have the gift of eloquence or oratory, but what he says is likely to be worthy of him and worthy of his cause. But when he is speaking to kill time, his utterances are apt to be both unworthy of him and unworthy of the body in which he sits. As long as our rules are used to effectuate the people's business they are a credit to us, but when they are used as I have seen them used in this body during the last fortnight, then a spectacle ensues which may cause amusement at the time, but in the end it is going to be a matter of grave concern to every thoughtful man.

The reduction to ultimate absurdity was reached in the Chamber the other day when, after a Senator who had not spoken before on the question made a short, clear, and convincing speech in favor of the ship subsidy, another Senator rose and twitted him on the ground that he had contributed to the filibuster by expressing his views in support of the measure. In other words, Mr. President, when a fillbuster is on, a discussion of the merits of a public question is out of order. That, I say, is the reduction to an ultimate absurdity. I am one of those who believe that while the promoters of the fillbuster have gained a victory, that while they have succeeded in preventing a vote on this great public question, their victory is one which will be Pyrrhic-one more such and they may be

We can not long stimulate public opinion by outraging it unless we hear from it in pretty insistent terms; and above our chatter and above the creaking of our antiquated rules I seem the voice of America in anxiety not unmixed alarm: "Men and brethren, what are you doing to the Senate of the United States?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an in-

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator has indulged in a vitriolic criticism of Senators who have opposed the bill. That is his privilege. He has also criticized the rules of the Senate, and, as I understood, the able Senator has indicated that those rules prevent this body from functioning. Does not the Senator recall, in his wide experience and in his great learning, that we have operated under the present rules of the Senate with respect to debate for many, many years; that we have been able, notwithstanding unlimited debate, to pass more bills through the Senate than have been passed through the House, where they have the previous question; and that in the long experience of this country there have only been very few filibusters, and in practically every instance public opinion has justified the filibuster, and those who participated in the same received the meed of praise at the hands of their constituents?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I divide my answer into two parts because it is a double question. As to the first part, let me say that I did not criticize Senators who opposed the ship subsidy bill. I did not criticize those who took part in the filibuster so long as it was obvious that they were speaking from the heart upon the merits of the question. I think the Senator from Utah, when he speaks on the question, speaks to the merits and from a conviction which differs from mine, but which I respect. My remarks were directed to that kind of speaking which is time-consuming merely and which can not, by any stretch of the rule of relevancy, be related to the question before the body at the time.

In regard to the second matter, the appeal to the history of the Senate, I can only answer that the facts are what they are, and that the consequence of those facts will be what they will The consequences that I have observed during my short membership in this body are such as to make me feel that if the future is to be more worthy than the past, we need a change along the lines I have indicated.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, it might be well to observe as to the inference to be drawn from the Senator's remarks that the great majority of the Senate, that the vote on taking up the bill stood 46 to 38; that 8 of the Senators who voted to take up the bill were defeated at last November's election.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I was very much surprised to hear the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Pepper] indicate that he thought he would hear the voice of the American people condemning this filibuster. The filibuster was carried on in order that the voice of the American people on the pending question might be heard. The American people have passed on the question. They passed on it at the last election in November. It was one of the issues of that election, and the Congress which was elected at that time and which will come into office now inside of a week is a Congress which would reject this particular bill in obedience to the will of the American people. If, therefore, we are to listen to the voice of the American people, we should do exactly what we are doing-kill the bill which they have repudiated at the election last November.

I predict that before the Senator from Pennsylvania ends his term of office he himself, if he finds some great principle of government at stake which he can defend in no other way than by a filibuster, will resort to a filibuster. That was exactly what was at stake in the ship-subsidy issue. It was not simply the ship subsidy. It was a great question of representative government. Here in the Senate was a bare majority for the ship subsidy bill, a majority which, as the Senator from Florida [Mr. Fletcher] has indicated, consisted at the most of 7 or 8 votes as the bill came from the House, and possibly not even a majority as the committee proposed to amend it.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. I hope that the future will find me in the position of a man ready to speak on the subject before the Senate so long, but only so long, as I am speaking to the point and am expressing a vital conviction respecting the measure before the body. But I hope, sir, that I shall never be found in the position of talking against time merely because I disapprove of the result which the majority are trying to put across.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course, I accept the Senator's disavowal at this time, but I shall wait to see, if the occasion should arise when the Senator from Pennsylvania feels that a great fundamental principle of our Government is at stake, whether he will not go to all lengths to defend it. Many Senators have done so in the past, and I think many will do so in the future.

Now, what is the great question which was at stake? the question whether or not the Executive, by the use of the great powers that inhere in the Executive, could compel Congress, even by the slightest possible majority, to enact into permanent law for the next 15 years a piece of legislation which the people of the United States repudiated on election day last That is what was at stake. November.

What is this Government? It is a government of the people. Those who hold their places here in the Senate are merely the representatives of the people. The great fundamental fact is that the Government was established as a government of the people, and when the people have spoken and have already elected the next Congress it is an embezzlement of power for the hold-over Congress to enact something against which the people have already entered their solemn decree at the election polls. In order to prevent such an outrage, those who stand here as the representatives of the people are certainly entitled to avail themselves of all of their parliamentary rights and of all of the rules of the Senate. It has been done on this occasion; it has been done on other occasions; and I predict that

It will be done on occasions in the future.

What was the urgency of the measure? The President recommended it to the Congress of the United States nearly a year ago. Instead of pushing it to passage at that time, it was withheld until after the election, because it was known to be an unpopular measure. Then after the election was held it received again all the impulse that the administration could give it, with the idea of working it into the statute books before the newly elected representatives of the people were enabled to come here and to pass upon it as the representatives of the people. Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. I would merely wish to inquire whether the act of withholding the measure during the campaign had the effect attributed to it by the Senator of keeping it out of the campaign as an issue?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think not. It was discussed in many States and in most States, and by admission the Congress which the people elected is one which would not entertain, even under a small minority of the Senate had been defeating the will of the pressure of the President, this particular ship subsidy bill.

Why, Mr. President, the Senate has already expressed its opinion on the subject of passing legislation after the people have spoken against it. The Senate has gone as far as it could in passing through the Senate a joint resolution, as it did a few days ago, providing an amendment to the Constitution so that thereafter the new Congress elected in November shall come into being in January instead of March and shall hold a meeting in January instead of nearly a year later. Why was that?

I say that it was for the purpose of enabling the people of the United States who have acted at an election to take possession of their Government and not to permit a hold-over Congress of representatives to usurp power which has been denied to them.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President-

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Florida. Mr. FLETCHER. I will call attention to the Congressional RECORD of June 21, 1922, page 9107, where, in a letter addressed to Mr. Mondell upon this subject, the President said:

My Dear Mr. Mondell You have been advised by those who have discussed the matter with me in personal Interview that I am in complete accord with the opinion of leaders among the majority in the House that the final consideration of the merchant marine bill in the House might well be postponed until approximately such time as House Members will be called in active attendance to send the tariff bill to conference. I am writing to give formal confirmation and to express the satisfaction with which I contemplate having this measure taken directly by Members to their constituencies for such reaction as will enable them to translate the deliberate preference of the country into a national policy fixed by law.

Then he concludes:

I confidently believe that if you and your associates will take the problem to the people at home you will encounter a very favorable reaction on a patriotic interest which concerns all Amercia, conspicuously to-day and of greater consequence to our future.

That letter is dated June 20, 1922. The Republicans took the issue to the people and the people responded in November.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Florida; and now I call the President's letter to the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER], who, I think, perhaps did not appreciate its importance when it was read, The President wrote a letter to the Republican leader of the House of Representatives, Mr. MONDELL, in which he recommended that the ship subsidy bill be allowed to go over until after the election, in order that the people in that election might render their verdict on that great issue. Now, after they have rendered that verdict and elected a Congress in repudiation of the bill the President asks the dying Congress, under dire threats, to put the bill through and to fasten it on the country for 15 years, so that the next Congress can not get rid of it.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHORTEDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield. Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the facts respecting the President's letter are, no doubt, as the Senator from Nebraska has stated them, but all of us who campaigned in the various States have knowledge of the fact that this measure was so little discussed in many of the most important campaigns that by no stretch of the statement can it accurately have been said to have been in issue or to have determined the election or defeat of Senators. I do not assume to speak as to the States in which I did not personally campaign, but I do know the course of events in about 10 States, and I know that in those States, in some of which Republicans were reelected and in some of which they were defeated, the ship subsidy bill was a negligible consideration. Whether the President intended that the question might be submitted to the jury of the American people or whether he did not, the fact is that there was no verdict on the subject, as we all know.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hardly see how it would be possible to submit to a people for a referendum a question in a more effective way than to have the President of the United States, in the midst of a campaign, address a letter to the Republican leader of the House of Representatives and recommend to him that action on the bill be postponed until after the election in order that the people of the United States might have the opportunity to pass upon it. That is exactly what the President of the United States did, and that is exactly what Mr. MONDELL took for the fact; and Mr. Mondell went into his campaign in Wyoming as a candidate for the Senate of the United States against the present able Senator from that State [Mr. Kendrick], and Mr. Mondell was beaten in a Republican State, while in the State of Nebraska the Republicans as well as Democrats were against the ship subsidy bill. So strongly were they against it that my Republican opponent was compelled to come out and avow openly and repeatedly that he was opposed to the ship subsidy bill. He could not have held as he did the Republican votes if he had not made that avowal. That is the general opinion throughout the West among Republicans as well as among Democrats. At this late day to say that the people of the United States have not passed upon the question, it seems to me, is an absolute absurdity.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PEPPER. My proposition is that gentlemen may interpret popular votes as they please in these matters. I heard the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] make an able and ingenious argument for the purpose of showing that the refusal of the United States to enter the League of Nations was not an issue in the campaign of 1920. All those statements are differences of fundamental apprehension. We can not successfully contend that popular votes result in sustaining our individual views, and expect those who differ from us to agree

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President-

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee. Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to call attention to the fact that in Tennessee my Republican opponent, former Senator Newell Sanders, issued a platform in which he stated to the people that if elected he would vote for the ship subsidy bill, which was one of the principal issues of the campaign. It was really the issue of the campaign in my State, and the Republican candidate on that issue was defeated by quite a considerable majority

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, not only is it true that the next Congress will be overwhelmingly against the ship subsidy, as is well known, not only is it true that is the reason the President has tried to drive it through this Congress, but even this Congress has expressed by its votes in both Houses the fact that only presidential influence has main-tained it as an issue before the legislative bodies. There is There is in the House of Representatives a Republican majority to-day, including "lame ducks," of 160, and yet upon the recommenda-tion and the urgent appeals of the Republican administration the majority that this bill received in the House of Representatives was only 24. Here in the Senate there is a nominal Republican majority of 24 at the present time, and yet the highest majority that this bill could poll, with all of the strength of the administration behind it, was seven or eight. That is a very good indication that this Congress, constituted as it is, would not have considered this bill had it not been for Executive influence

Mr. President, to what extent did this Executive influence go? It was not simply confined to the execution of the constitutional power of the President in recommending the passage of the ship subsidy bill, as he did, I believe, last year; it was not merely the use by the Executive of his personal influence with individual Senators; but upon a second occasion he came before Congress and practically resorted to threats to influence the Congress to act upon this bill at this time. Let me quote some of his language:

Then, if Congress fails in providing the requested alternative measuse, the executive branch of the Government may proceed as best it can to end the losses—in "liquidation and humiliation."

He thus threatened in that message to do something of a humiliating character in order to put a stop to the operations of the law as it exists at the present time. What right had the President of the United States to insist on having this bill passed through Congress upon the penalty of having the administration do something that would humiliate the country? We have upon the statute books a shipping law. Why is not that law carried out? Congress passed it; the President signed Why should not the administration carry out that law until Congress is ready to make some new legislation on the subject? Why should Congress be threatened by the Execu-tive with an act which will be one of humiliation to the country as a penalty for our failure to accept his recommendation?

Mr. HARRISON. The President himself voted for that law while a Member of the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am reminded of the fact that the President of the United States while a Senator voted for that law. That law is upon the statute books, but instead of carrying out that law in letter and in spirit, instead of carrying out that law with a view to giving it the utmost test to ascertain if we can not have a Government-owned merchant marine, as we have a Government-built merchant marine, the whole attention of the Shipning Board for a year and more has been given to some plan of wrecking Government ownership and operation. I say that it is the duty of the President of the United States to install a Shipping Board composed of men who will carry out the purpose of the Jones Act of 1920.

The Republican National Convention when it met indorsed that act; they were proud of it. The platform then adopted said:

We indorse the sound legislation recently enacted by the Republican Congress that will insure the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine.

What has become of that declaration? What has become of that resolution? A merchant marine was built by and under Government control. We have got the ships; we have 1,400 ships; we are told that they are getting obsolete. Then, let us build ships that are not obsolete; let us carry out the purpose of the law; let us give it a good trial. Upon the ocean it is not man against man or company against company, but virtually it is nation against nation. That is admitted in this bill. It is admitted that it is necessary to have the Nation behind the ships, but it is only proposed to leave to individuals the profits from running the ships and to enrich them by subsidies out of the Treasury. We say that upon the sea it is nation against nation; we say that having entered upon the trial of having a Government-owned and, if necessary, a Government-operated merchant marine, we can match the other nations of the world that back their merchant marines merely by subsidies. I say it is the duty of the Executive, instead of trying to compel Congress to carry out his particular plan; it is his duty to carry out in letter and in spirit the law which was passed in 1920, of which the Republican convention was so proud when it met in the summer of that year.

Mr. LODGE. I present, and ask to have printed in the RECORD, a letter from the commander of the C. C. Thomas (Navy). Post, No. 244, of the American Legion. It is a letter in regard to the ship subsidy bill, and I think it is a very interest-

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

C. C. THOMAS (NAVY) POST, NO. 244,
AMERICAN LEGION,
NAVY POST OF THE PACIFIC COAST,
San Francisco, Calif., December 11, 1922.

Senator Samuel M. Shortridge, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Senator Samuel M. Shorthdog.

Dear Senator Shorthdog.: Inasmuch as the "subsidy bill" will soon be before the Senate, Washington, D. C.

Dear Senator Shorthdog.: Inasmuch as the "subsidy bill" will soon be before the Senate for consideration, it seems the proper time to advise you of the attitude of this organization, composed of 700 seafaring men who served in the United States Navy during the late war, on the question. A committee was appointed to investigate the matter, and as a result of this investigation the post voted unanimously to support the principle of the establishment of a merchant marine at this time by means of Government aid, commonly, but we believe inaccurately, termed subsidy. If I may encreach upon your valuable time, I will mention some of the considerations which prompted the post to take the stand it has.

There are but three grounds upon which an argument calling for Government aid for merchant marine can be founded—patriotic, commercial, or military. It is our position that the first two are not weighty enough to justify the taxation called for upon the American public, but that the real reason for the creation and maintenance of a merchant marine is to be found in the necessity for national defense.

Adverting to the patriotic reasons for this measure, the post feels that while it is a matter of national pride to see ships in all parts of the world flying the Stars and Stripes, it is doubtful if the American public would be willing to pay the large sums necessary to attain that end in order that that sentiment might be indulged in. No doubt tourists and ocean travelers for the first time take delight in traveling on United States vessels, but these form the minority among ocean travelers. The majority is composed of those who travel for business or who are constant voyagers from one country to another, back and forth, for their own pleasure. These soon lose interest in the nationality of the vessel they travel in, just as the land traveler is indifferent to the personnel of the train to the heavy Atlantic Ocean travel between Europe and the United States.

It is therefore concluded that public sentiment would not instify or approve of any Government aid such as now under consideration for the simple objective of having vessels flying the United States flag, engaged upon the commerce of the world.

For second consideration is the commercial value of the establishment of a merchant marine by the United States. It has been asserted that we are large exporters and that our products should be exported in American bottoms. This, as a mere assertion, may be the opinion of a few; as a matter of practical business, what interest has the American farmer or manufacturer in what manner his merchandise is transported after he has sold it? Farm produce is usually sold by the farmer at the nearest market and goes into the hands of some form of a middleman. He may own an elevator or be a buyer on speculation; it is all the same to the producer. What he is interested in and interested in solely is the best price he can get for his goods, either f. o. b. the cars at his point of shipment or delivered to tidewater. It is of no concern of his that the purchaser, either directly or indirectly, ships his produce to a foreign country in a foreign bottom. He has no more interest in that form of transportation than he has in the method by which the purchaser carts the goods away from his factory or warehouse. Autotruck or horse-drawn truck, it is all the same to the producer. When he sells his product and gets his price his interest ceases and he turns his attention to future business. Therefore the argument in support of subsidy that American produce should be transported in American bottoms has no commercial foundation, although it may have some sentimental value.

to the future business. Therefore the argument in support of subsidy that American produce should be transported in American bottoms has no commercial foundation, although it may have some sentimental value.

The of remajors and has little threest in the most efficient value.

The of remajors and has little threest in the most efficient vessel which he employs. Efficient and economical service is what he is after, and it is what will always infinence him in the nor of the product o live in. After the war I commanded ships where American boys from the war were sailors, and I found them superior to any others, but they constantly complained of the slothful and insanitary habits of foreign members of the crew who would not keep the living quarters livable unless forced to do so. The fact is, an unfortunate habit has grown up of disregarding the living conditions on ships in the past, so that no self-respecting American boy would be contented to serve a necessary apprenticeship under such environment. Let us have a merchant marine of American ships, built by American workmen, but let us also provide such conditions that American sailors can go to sea and not be forced into competition with foreign sailors who are willing to work for less wages and whose living conditions are based on standards repugnant to our boys.

One other feature of the bill as it came from the House strikes me as being a concession to some influence not compatible with the insaline part of the content of the such content in the content of the content with a cargo of oil and the training of the crew of a vessel carrying general cargo received on a similar voyage? The ownership of the vessel makes no difference. Each has a similar training and confronts similar difficulties. It would seem that each would be entitled to similar subsidy. That the owner of one vessel also owns the cargo seems to the post should not enter into the matter at all as a matter of fairness. If that principle should be consistently carried out to its logical conclusion, the shipper of cargo on any vessel could not be an owner or stockholder in the vessel. We know that the contrary prevails; that often the owner of a vessel will purchase a cargo and ship it in his own vessel. It is true that certain business interests own and operate their own ships as a matter either of profit or policy, or both, but it is submitted

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I have listened with profound attention and genuine interest to the speech of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Pepper]. Notwithstanding his earnest-ness and his manifest sincerity, I am inclined to believe that, as the result of practical experience, he will materially modify the opinion which he has so forcefully expressed.

As an academic proposition, Mr. President, it is very difficult to defend the blocking of legislation by an ingenious use of the rules of the Senate, a sort of substitution of force for argument. As indefensible as that policy appears when abstractly and academically considered, it has as a dernier resort and on rare occasions been resorted to by the Senate, and, as has been well said, in almost every instance the end has justified the means, and public opinion has approved this unusual and apparently unjustifiable expedient.

Mr. President, if in the past a filibuster has been justified, at the present time it is commendable; and I am of the opinion that if the Senator from Pennsylvania-himself a profound scholar, rich in his knowledge of the history of his country, and deeply learned in its law-will weigh and consider, as Lord Bacon was wont to say, the need of a brake upon legislation at this time, he will pause before he lends his great influence to a material modification of the rules of the Senate in this

Mr. President, the evil of modern legislation is not our lack of consideration, is not our slowness in enacting law, is not in the paucity of measures enacted. It is in the multiplicity of acts, in the lack of consideration, in the hurry, the confusion, the irresponsibility, which mark the deliberations of both Houses of Congress.

There never was a time when it was more necessary that Congress should hold and should exercise every power it now retains and every expedient now available for the protection of the legislative body of this Nation against Executive aggression. The history of civil liberty in continental Europe, as the Senator well knows, is contemporaneous with the growth of the power of its parliaments. The growth of the liberties of Great Britain is the growth of the House of Commons. Such civil liberty as is enjoyed by the French is attributable in great measure to the aggressions of the Chamber of Deputies upon the arbitrary power of the Bourbons. The framers of our Constitution, as is evidenced by The Federalist, justly apprehended and threw around this body every safeguard to save and preserve it from Executive aggression. If Hamilton—yea, even Hamilton and Jefferson and Madison and Jay-could dread Executive aggression when we had but a handful of employees, when the Executive power was but a modicum of what it is now, what is the peril of that same aggression now? care not whether it be a Democrat or a Republican at the other end of the Avenue. I am making no partisan appeal now. I am talking earnestly to the Senator from Pennsylvania, because I believe that he is capable of rising above partisan considerations and looking at this question to which he has addressed himself as a patriot and as a scholar. If there was danger then, what is the danger now? And if there is danger now, what is the impending peril of the immediate future?

This is the only free government on earth, with the possible exception of the French Republic. It is not true even of the French, because they do not hold office there at the pleasure of the President to the extent appointees serve at his pleasure here. Here, every four years, with the change of the President-for civil service is more or less of a mockery-comes a change in the character, the hopes, and personnel of nearly a million employees and appointees. The tremendous power of the President is such that his little finger weighs more thanthe thigh of the Senate. What will be the result to-morrow. when the Government operates telegraphs and telephones, railroads and steamships, possibly mines and factories? Is there anything on earth that will save what is left of legislative independence from utter extermination except the power in the Senate to stop the clock, to "chock" the wheels, until the people can take a second thought?

To my mind, the most glaring defect in our whole system, and perhaps the only great defect not apprehended by the framers of the Constitution, was the grievous fault of having a Congress elected, its lower House named every two years, and yet that Congress in only one out of the two years is responsive to the people that elect them. It is amazing. We were supposed to be the most responsible of all governments to the people. The most numerous body was elected for two years, as was expressly declared by the framers of the Constitution, both in the debates at the time and in the Federalist, that they might be immediately responsible to the people who elected them, and yet they are responsible only half the time.

As the Senator from Pennsylvania well knows, any radical change in public opinion in Great Britain is immediately reflected in the complexion and in the leadership of parties. No premier, no party, lasts an hour after an adverse opinion of the constituency which elected that parliament and which instituted that government has been definitely ascertained. The King of England takes no part in partisan discussion, or in party government, the people immediately determine the course of governmental affairs by a direct and emphatic expression.

In this country it happened recently, as it has happened repeatedly, that the people made an emphatic and startling expression of the changed attitude of the public upon vital questions, and it is not reflected at all and can not be for two long years. That is an anomaly in civil government. It is a grievous fault in the fabric of our own institutions. There is no doubt, there can be no doubt, that the people we represent, the sovereign nation whose will we are supposed to voice, is hostile to this legislation. As is known to the Senator from Pennsylvania, I presume known to the Senate, known to the public, announced in the press everywhere, and nowhere doubted or denied that the next House and Senate will repudiate the ship subsidy. I will not say, with more art than candor, but with exquisite art, the Senator from Pennsylvania has sald that the President of the Untied States when this measure was pending, and public opinion was centered upon it, had written a solemn communication to the leader of the House of Representatives proposing that a referendum be taken at the next election, and, pursuant to the suggestion of the President, the House and the Senate put aside this legislation in order that that referendum might be taken; yet we are told that there was no referendum at all.

The Senator from Pennsylvania says he did not discuss it and that it was not discussed in Pennsylvania. Why was it not discussed when the President had proposed that it be discussed? For only one reason in the world: In campaigning from Cape May to the Mississippi River in the last election, all up and down the Atlantic coast, I found a very few candidates for office on the majority side who were prone to discuss this measure; and why? Because it was not important? Oh. no; the filibuster is an evidence of its importance. The chagrin of the President is an evidence of its importance. The loud and continuous howl that goes up from the public press is conclusive evidence of its importance. It was important enough. reason they did not discuss it was that it would not make them any votes; and wise and seasoned statesmen, after they had sounded the waters, after they had felt public opinion, deliberately discussed something else, because they knew that the ship-subsidy cock would not fight, because they knew that the best way to lose the election was to advocate a subsidy, and a subsidy of that character.

The Senator from Pennsylvania has asked why this was postponed. It is perfectly plain; not that the President wished further discussion of it by the country, but that the men who were expected to put it over preferred to answer for the deed after an election and not before; because the President knew that in the face of this ominous and premonitory growl, curses not loud but deep, which already rose East and West, North and South, against this ship subsidy, he would endanger not only the subsidy but the political scalps of the men who advocated it, and for that reason, with a strategy more cunning than candid, more characteristic of the astute politician than the fearless crusader, he waited until some men-not the Senator from Pennsylvania-could do in safety what they dared not do in the face of danger.

Mr. President, I claim, and I believe he will at length concur, that when it is perfectly manifest that the plain will of the people can be served by this expedient, and when the safety and security and happiness of the country depend upon it, and the welfare of the country will be endangered and the manifest will of the people thwarted if this expedient is not resorted to, then it is not only the privilege-it is the plain duty-of every wise and courageous statesman to resort to it, for, after all, brushing aside all the rubbish, the prime purpose of the Senator from Pennsylvania and the prime purpose of the Senator from Kentucky and the solemn duty of every Member in this body is to carry into effect, if he conscientiously can, the manifest will of the people who have elected him and of the Nation he serves, without regard to the means, if the means are legal and are authorized under the rules of the Senate.

For instance, here is a case which may arise. I hope it will not; I pray God it may not; but the Senator from Pennsylvania, as well as myself, may have apprehended it, not without cause. The public is subject to hysteria and to fits of temporary anger, just as an individual is. There are times when waves of wrath and recklessness sweep from coast to coast, just as they sweep the individual at times from his sane and safe moorings of caution and of reason. Suppose that under an agitation socialistic and communistic in its nature a temporary majority should be secured in both the House and the Senate, and suppose that in two years from that time the people, clothed and in their right minds, should repent of their recklessness, should become disgusted with the wild, bolshevistic, socialistic nostrums that were fed them, and should utterly repudiate that Congress by an overwhelming majority; and suppose laws should be proposed destroying the right of private property wherever the Federal Government could destroy it; denying the right to dispose of it by will; establishing a communistic and soviet régime, as far as it could be done under the Constitution, were ready to enact bill after bill which the Senator believed was in violation of the Constitution, which would tear down the pillars of the temple; and he knew that within 10 days sane, safe, courageous men would be here to voice the will of the people.

Does the Senator mean to say that he would hesitate to block that legislation by any power God and nature and the laws of this body had given him; that he would cavil over the academic propriety of the weapon he used to kill the noisome and dangerous thing; that he would say, "I will not save the Constitution of my country; I will not maintain these institutions; I know all these things are dangerous; I know they are destructive of all for which our fathers have fought and have bled and labored for nearly two centuries; I abhor this character of legislation; I realize that it is wild and ill-considered and destructive of everything that makes life safe or sweet in these United States, but it is technically ill-advised to filibuster: and so, if they want to vote, I will give them a vote; I will be consistent, even though the country goes to the devil?"

I do not believe the Senator, upon mature consideration, would follow such a course.

During the delivery of Mr. STANLEY's speech,

CONFIRMATION OF HARRY S. NEW TO BE POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, through the courtesy of the Senator from Kentucky, who yields to me, I ask the Presiding Officer to lay before the Senate the nomination of Senator New to be Postmaster General.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHORTRIDGE in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE House, February 27, 1923.

To the Senate of the United States:

I nominate HARRY S. New, of Indiana, to be Postmaster General, effective March 4, 1923, vice Hubert Work, appointed Secretary of the Interior.

WARREN G. HARDING.

Mr. LODGE. I make the usual request, where a Senator has been nominated to high office, that as in open executive session the nomination be now considered and confirmed, without reference to a committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of this nomination in open session? The Chair hears none. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Harry S. New to be Postmaster General? [Putting the question.] The nomination is unanimously confirmed.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the President may be notified. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The President will be notified.

Mr. LODGE. I thank the Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate resumes legislative session.

After the conclusion of Mr. Stanley's speech,

THE MERCHANT MARINE

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not want to make a speech. I merely want to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, if I may have his attention for a moment. In this morning's Post I notice this headline:

Novel ship plans soon from Lasker. Nature to be startling, chairman says after interview with the President.

That is the headline, and in the article it is stated thatinasmuch as the President has declared one of the prime purposes of the ship bill to be to get the Government out of the shipping business, it was generally believed yesterday that the administration's policy contemplated quick and thorough liquidation. Members of Congress conversant with the Shipping Board affairs suggested that the administration, through invocation of such indirect aids as are contained in the merchant marine act of 1920, might endeavor to make operation of vessels under the American flag attractive enough to provide a sale for the Covernment owned tourner. the Government-owned tonnage.

Mr. Lasker and Chairman Jones of the Senate Commerce Committee have urged the President to carry out section 34 of the merchant marrine act.

We all saw that the chairman of the Shipping Board had a conference with the President yesterday and read of the statements made thereafter, which to me were rather alarming, Can the Senator tell us whether it is proposed at this time by the chairman of the Shipping Board to sell our ships at once?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know what will be done.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has not had a conference with them and is not familiar with what they intend to do?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator will agree with me that to undertake such a plan as that at this time, when there is no market for ships, would be very disastrous to our merchant marine.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I express the hope that the Shipping Board and the President will try to carry out in the full spirit the act of 1920.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to join the Senator in that hope. The act of 1920, if carried out according to its intent and purwould mean, in my judgment, the building up of American merchant marine. The Shipping Board, if it did carry it out, would do itself great credit, but if it undertook to take advantage of any authority that is given to dismantle or dispose of our shipping without reference to the intent and purpose of that act, it would make a great mistake, and the American people would hold the board responsible for it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I can not believe, and I will not believe until the things are actually done, that any action will be taken after we have disposed of this measure except what is believed to be for the very best interest of the American people and to promote the building up of an American merchant marine. However disappointed anybody may be at the failure to pass the bill, I think we all recognize that the Senate has acted within its rights and its powers, and that the only thing to be looked after hereafter is to promote the interests of the American people, and, if possible, under existing conditions and existing laws to develop an adequate American merchant marine on a permanent basis. I am satisfied that that is the course that will be pursued.

Mr. McKELLAR. Knowing how the Senator from Washington felt about it, I want to say to him that my first thought after reading the article yesterday afternoon, and again after reading the article which was virtually republished in the morning paper, I thought probably it would be a wise thing for the Congress to pass such a resolution. I understood from what the Senator said that he feels, as I have indicated, with reference to the intent and purposes of the shipping act of 1920.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would not want to reflect upon what I believe to be the integrity, the conscientious, and patriotic intentions of the men in charge by the passage of a resolution that would question their good intentions and patriotic purposes

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the pointed reference of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Peppera] to myself and to my own part in the fillbuster is such that I feel the debate should not entirely close without a word from me.

I noted the ardor and evident sincerity with which the Senator from Pennsylvania announced that so far as he was concerned he would only speak in this Chamber to the subject under consideration, and then he proceeded to speak about everything else except the subject that is under consideration. The question is whether or not we shall recommit the bill, and there was not one word in the brilliant argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania pointing out why the bill should be recommitted. He provoked one of the most brilliant debates that has been held in this Chamber since I have been here. The political reply of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCH-COCK] was very appropriate to everything the Senator from Pennsylvania said, but there was not one word in it about why the bill should be recommitted.

The reply of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], able and to the point, touching upon every suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, was likewise appropriate and timely from the standpoint of what the Senator from Pennsylvania said, but neither did it contain a single word about what would be accomplished by recommitting the shipping bill to the Committee on Commerce. Therefore it occurs to me that we must all neglect to see ourselves as others see us.

So far as I am concerned, I announced the first time I spoke in reference to the bill that I would oppose it, that I would use every parliamentary means to prevent its passage, by vote or otherwise. I pointed out that in my judgment the attempt to force it through at the short session of Congress was a filibuster on the part of the administration and the Republican leaders, and I still adhere to that view.

If I cared now to go back into the history of our country I think I could show that the short sessions of Congress were not designed by the fathers of our country in making the Constitution for the purpose of general legislation. They were to be the sessions for the making of appropriations and the transaction of the routine and ordinary business of the country. It is a violation of that spirit to attempt to consider weighty matters like general legislation of this kind. Therefore, I say the filibuster was justified, and I do not hesitate to call it a I do not myself sail under a false face or a mask of any kind. When I filibuster I want everybody to know it. When I fight I want that to be known. I want my constituents to know that I have kept the promise I made to them to use every means in my power, within the rules and within the law, to defeat the bill.

The Senator from Pennsylvania when he started with his very able and very eloquent speech, knew that the bill was dead. He knew that if the bill was recommitted it would be a mere formality and that following that we would take up the filled milk bill and would proceed to the consideration of some other important matter. His speech under those circumstances was just as much a time-killer, just as well known to him to be a time killer, as anything that I said in reference to the beautiful swan song of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Freling-

Now, to conclude, Mr. President, I want to insert in the Record the final conclusions, after full deliberation, of all of the great farm organizations in the United States in reference to the bill. I have the resolutions passed by the American Farm Bureau Federation Convention in Chicago in December, 1922. At their national convention and after their president had come before the committees of Congress and had supported the ship subsidy legislation, the national convention of the American Farm Bureau Federation declared against it. I have here the resolution of the National Grange adopted at its annual session at Wichita, Kans., in 1922. I call especial attention to the fact that both of these great farm organizations are numerous and very powerful in the State of Pennsylvania. I have the resolutions of the Farmers' National Council plan on the merchant marine adopted at the reconstruction conference, Washington, D. C., January 19, 1919. I have the resolution adopted by the National Board of Farm Organizations at the semiannual conference in Washington, D. C., October, 1922. I have also a letter from the representatives of those four great organizations. I now ask permission that the resolutions and letter to which I have referred may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, If there be no objection the request is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Resolutions on ship subsidy adopted by four national general farm organizations. Passed by American Farm Bureau Federation Con-vention in Chicago, December, 1922.

SHIP SUBSIDY.

Inasmuch as it has been the general policy of this country to subsidize railroads by land grants, bonds, and granting special privileges, manufacturers by a protective tariff, and it is now proposed by those in charge of our general policy to subsidize our shipping interests by the payment to them of a bonus, for all of which the consuming public must foot the bill; we emphatically protest against the continuance of a policy that has become confiscatory instead of protective.

National Grange resolution adopted at annual session, Wichita, Kans., November, 1922. SHIP SUBSIDY.

The National Grange hereby declares its unalterable opposition to all ship-subsidy legislation and to every form of direct subsidy to private enterprises, and it pledges the full strength of the organization toward the defeat of whatever form of ship-subsidy legislation has been or hereafter may be introduced into Congress. If upon investigation it is found that the American merchant marine is handicapped in its operation by present conditions and laws, then the grange favors a revision of the navigation laws, rather than Government aid through ship subsidy. a revision of ship subsidy.

Farmers' National Council plan on the merchant marine adopted at reconstruction conference, Washington, D. C., January, 1919.

Enormous sums have been expended by the Government in constructing ships. The ships so constructed at Government expense should remain the property of the people of the country and should be operated as a merchant marine for the benefit of the people as a whole, with due regard to terms and conditions of employment.

Resolution adopted by National Board of Farm Organizations at semi-annual conference, Washington, D. C., October, 1922.

Whereas it is apparent that the question of granting subsidies to our merchant shipping will soon be brought to a vote in Congress; and Whereas the farmers of the United States have been traditionally opposed to the granting of such subsidies; and Whereas the plan embodied in the Jones-Greene bill, which is now under consideration, contains many provisions that are extremely objectionable and would, in our opinion, be detrimental to the best interest of the country, as a whole, if enacted: Therefore be it Resolved. That this body record an emphatic protest against the passage of this proposed legislation.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 21, 1923.

Letter from the four national general farm organizations opposing the pending ship subsidy bill and asking consideration for vital farm measures.

To the Members of the United States Senate.

GENTLEMEN: The four national general farm organizations, whose representatives sign this letter, are opposed to the pending ship subsidy bill. We inclose you a copy of the resolution on this subject adopted by each of these organizations.

We respectfully submit that the measures of vital importance to the farmers of the Nation now pending in Congress should have adequate consideration before the adjournment of this Congress.

Yours respectfully,

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
By GRAY SULVER, Washington Representative, NATIONAL GRANGE,
BY T. C. ATKESON,
FARMERS' NATIONAL COUNCIL,
BY BENJAMIN C. MARSH, Manaying Director, NATIONAL BOARD OF FARM ORGANIZATIONS,
BY CHAS. A. LYMAN.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I was ready for a vote some two hours ago. This debate was started by a Republican Senator, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Townsend], who accused or intimated very strongly that Senators who are opposing the bill are playing politics and undertaking to deceive the people. A speech was then made by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Pepper], another Republican. I knew yesterday afternoon that he was going to speak to-day. It is all right for those Senators who favor the measure to speak, I presume, but those who oppose it, when they speak, are standing in the way of the program of the shipping trust, and therefore out of order.

Mr. President, we take the responsibility for our part in this fight. We welcome the responsibility of the results of the campaign made against the ship subsidy bill. Party welcomes at any time a contest with the time-serving

Republican Party upon the question before the American people as to whether this great fleet, costing three thousand million dollars, shall be given to the ship trust, and on top of that the American people are to be taxed $50,000,000 a year to run the ships after they are given to them.

the ships after they are given to them.

So the Senator from Pennsylvania, when he chides us for speaking against the bill and delaying a vote upon it, may content himself with the thought that we will be held accountable and either punished or approved for our conduct in the case. We will be entitled to the praise of every patriotic American for defeating this monstrous measure.

What right have the lame ducks of the Senate, in the closing hours of this Congress, to vote this vast sum of money to those who are in charge of the ship trust? What right have they to force these ships up for sale in a dead market and throw restrictions around the sale of them to the extent that private individuals can not buy the ships and operate them? What right have we to provide a program by which the ship trust, and the ship trust alone, may buy the ships all in a bunch and then tax the American people for millions of dollars with which to run the ships?

What sort of tactics have been employed to bring the bill before the Congress? What did the President do in the outset? He called Congress together before its time. He assembled the Representatives of the people in order that they might have a longer time in which to pass this thing or jam it through the Congress before the 4th of March. Did that look like alertness on the part of those who favor the bill? Did that look like every effort was being employed to put through this legis-lation? It certainly did. When it was up in the House the papers stated that the leader of the majority [Mr. Mondell] had gone to the White House and had told the President, "We have the votes to pass it." What were those votes? Who constituted the majority in the House to pass the bill? Lame ducks-60-odd of them-beaten at the polls and coming back asking favors at the hands of a President in power, voting to put through an administration measure by a majority of only 24 votes, secured the passage of the bill in the House. The Republican Party with 169 majority in the House could muster only 24 majority to pass this monstrous measure by men just defeated and going out of Congress, commissions expiring next Sunday, and yet we are criticized and condemned for holding back and not permitting them to pass the bill that lame ducks were about to put over.

I have no apology to make to any of them for the fight I am making against it. What happened at Verdun? Every brave Frenchman who stood and those who fell said ever and anon to their comrades, "They shall not pass." Every Senator on this side of the Chamber who is fighting this ship-trust measure has said to his fellow Senators, "It shall not pass." And in the closing hours of this session I repeat it to you. "It shall not pass." I have no apology, and I am sure those who have fought with me have no apology to make.

Why was not the matter submitted last fall in the election? The President's letter said that it ought to be submitted to the people. Now, the Senator from Pennsylvania said that it was not mentioned much up his way. That would look like they intended to wait until the election was over and then say, if they had won out strong, "It was an issue and here is the President's letter announcing that it ought to be submitted to the people. They have passed on it and therefore there is a mandate from the people to Congress to pass it."

date from the people to Congress to pass it."

But what did the election do? It repudlated the administration; it cut the majority of 169 down to about 15 in the House of Representatives, and it cut the majority in this body from 24 down to about 8 or 10, I believe. So, Mr. President, it is but a few days until the new Congress will come upon the scene. Then we can decide what we shall do.

Let us see whether the opposition has been fair with us on this side of the Chamber and with the American people. There has been many a time here when a vote could have been obtained as to whether or not the policy proposed in the bill should have been tried out for one year, but the Republican Senators would not accept the offer; nothing short of 10 or 15 years would satisfy them. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] asked the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Ransdell] if he were willing to consent to a vote on the substitute of the Senator from Tennessee for the bill, and the Senator from Louisiana said he was not. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh] asked the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones], in charge of the bill, if he would agree to unanimous consent to let us vote on our proposition, the McKellar bill, which is a substitute for the pending bill, and the Senator from Washington said he would not. So we are not preventing Senators who really favor an American merchant marine from getting a vote; they could have obtained a vote by consenting that a vote could be had; they could have tried the Senate out and found out if it would take our views of this matter, but they refused to do it. They had a chance to get a vote twice, and twice they refused. So Senators themselves on the other side of the Chamber must take the responsibility for the failure to get a vote on a plan for a merchant marine and the tactics to which they have resorted.

The Republicans commenced having night sessions here when some Senators who are old and infirm had been staying in this Chamber week after week and month after month, worn and weary; but that did not make any difference; they were dragged here, and night sessions were held and the session lasted from morning until nearly midnight, trying out a test of physical endurance.

If it killed anybody, why, of course, that had to follow; if any fell by the wayside, if they could not stand the test of physical endurance, but died while the Republicans were trying to put this ship subsidy bill through in the closing hours of the session, what of it? I want the country to see somewhat of the other side of this picture.

of the other side of this picture.

Now, we are criticized by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Pepper] for filibustering against this ship-trust measure. Mr. President, I pray to the God of the Republic that a hard-and-fast cloture rule will never be fastened upon this body. This is the one distinctive outstanding American deliberative body, and Senators, I warn you to ponder long and deliberately before you destroy the freedom of debate in the United States Senate. You have your remedy. You can hold the party responsible that conducts a filibuster, and the American people, when we go before them, can decide whether or not they condemn or indorse the filibustering tactics employed.

Senators on the other side of the Chamber could not answer the able, superb, and powerful speech of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Stanley] which he made against cloture or gag rule in the Senate. Suppose the Bolshevists and Socialists whom the Republicans have created by the thousands by their cruel policies should become strong enough to obtain control of the House and Senate, as the Senator from Kentucky suggested, undertake to enact dangerous measures into law, and the minority should stand and say to such dangerous measures: "You shall not pass; we believe in property rights and in human rights; these measures are fraught with grave danger to the American form of government, and you shall not pass them."

Under the theory of the Senator from Pennsylvania the opponents of those theories ought to yield because the majority wanted to put them over; but I say that we should have the right to stand and that it would be our duty to stand and fight until the last man fell in the contest to preserve properfy rights, personal rights, and the rights and libertles of the whole people.

I want to say this, and then I am through: No country on earth has such a ship subsidy as is proposed in this Republican ship subsidy bill. Why should we hurry into this one? There is no sound reason for such action.

Mr. President, I am not willing to leave the disposition of these $3,000,000,000 worth of American ships to the discretion of the Shipping Board. I know there are some very clever gentlemen on the board—one from my State—but we should aid the board and direct the board as to what Congress wants done in the matter. I want this Congress to pass a joint resolution providing what shall be done with these ships.

Let us say in a resolution to the Shipping Board that it is the judgment of Congress that these ships should be kept in order, if nothing else, and not sold until the market gets better and we can obtain a better deal for the American people in the matter. So let the Congress pass a resolution simply stating what we desire done. It would be no reflection on the Shipping Board. I am sure that some of the members of the Shipping Board would welcome a resolution from us stating what we would like to have done when the ship-subsidy proposition has failed.

Mr. President, let us have this clear in our minds for a moment. Senators in this body have the right to use any legitimate tactics in order to defeat a bad measure. A newspaper man asked me a few days ago if we were not conducting a filibuster. I said, "No; you should hardly call it that; it is a determined effort on the part of certain Senators in a deliberative body to defeat a bad bill." I said I liked that description of it better than calling it a filibuster.

Now, Mr. President, let us meet the test and vote as to whether or not we shall recommit the bill. If no legislation is had in reference to the matter at this session, it will be the fault of the Republican Party, because the Senator from Tennessee asked unanimous consent to vote upon his substitute, and it was denied; and the Senator from Washington in charge of the bill denied unanimous consent to take a like vote. So if a vote is prevented, it will be prevented by those in charge of the bill, because we will not permit "lame ducks" by three majority to put this monstrosity over in the closing hours of the session. Our determined effort to defeat this bill deserves and, I believe, will receive the unstinted plaudits of the Ameri-

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I have occupied no time on this bill and I shall occupy now only a moment or two. been a filibuster going on against the ship subsidy bill for some I trust that in the closing days of the session we may not, as would now seem to be apparent, have another filibuster against the filled milk bill. I trust that we may have very promptly a vote on the pending motion to recommit, and that then we may have a chance to vote to bring before the Senate the filled milk bill, and I shall vote to have that bill considered.

I desire to say only one thing, and then to make a request. What I wish to say relates not particularly to this bill but it relates to the legislative situation. The country is aware, as Members of the Senate are aware, that for weeks a filibuster has been going on here against the ship subsidy bill. That bill has never at any time had a chance to have a vote upon its merits, and it will not have that opportunity. All I desire to say is that, in my judgment, the time is near at hand when the rules of the Senate will have to be amended so as to make out of the Senate a legislative body rather than a mere debating society or, at times, a vaudeville show. I think the first busi ness of the Senate in the next Congress ought to be to amend its rules.

Mr. President, some time age the Cleveland (Ohio) Chamber of Commerce appointed a committee to make a study of the shipping situation. They submitted a very carefully considered report, in some of the conclusions of which, by the way, I do not happen to concur. For example, they suggest a repeal of the seamen's act. I am not in favor of a repeal of that act. They seem to think that the pending bill contemplates such repeal. It does not, and does not in any essential respect amend the seamen's act. That act ought to be retained, in my judgment, on the statute books. There is, however, much valuable material that has been collected by the committee of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce, and I ask unanimous consent to have their report printed in the RECORD at this time in 8-point type.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the Record in 8-point type, as follows:

To the Board of Directors of the Cleveland Chamber of Com-

GENTLEMEN: Your committee on American merchant marine respectfully submits its report on the so-called ship subsidy bill. This bill was introduced into the United States Senate on February 23, 1922, and is entitled "A bill to amend and supplement the merchant marine act of 1920, and for other purposes." The following is

A BRIEF SUMMARY OF THE PRINCIPAL PROVISIONS OF THE BILL.

(1) It authorizes the sale as soon as practicable and consistent with good business methods either at public or private sale to persons who are citizens of the United States (with certain exceptions) all of the vessels built for and owned by the United States Shipping Board, and also authorizes the Shipping Board to set aside a fund out of part of the proceeds of such sales, which under certain conditions is to be loaned in aid of the construction of other ships as needed.

(2) It allows the owners of all ships documented under the laws of the United States and operated in foreign trade, as a deduction from their net income for income, excess profits, or war-profits tax purposes, for a period of 10 years, an amount equivalent to the net earnings of such vessels or profits from the sale thereof, provided that such owners invest or set aside for investment in new ships to be built in American yards an amount equivalent to such taxes which would otherwise have been payable.

(3) It contains certain provisions whereby 50 per cent of the immigrants coming to this country by sea are required to be transported in American ships.

(4) It provides for the creation of a naval reserve force from among those officers and seamen of our merchant marine who may voluntarily enlist for such service, the members of which force are subject to call in case of national emergency.

(5) It permits the Army and Navy transport service to be discontinued and such service to be contracted for with ships of the American merchant marine.

(6) It provides for the payment of certain amounts by way of subsidy to the owner of every documented vessel of the United States of 1,500 gross tons or more engaged in the foreign trade, such amounts to be calculated on the base rate of onehalf of 1 per cent for each gross ton of said vessel for each 100 nautical miles traveled, with additional amounts for faster vessels; a graduated scale of such additional allowances being provided for speeds between 13 and 23 or more knots an hour.

(7) No vessel, however, is entitled to such aid or subsidy unless her owner shall have entered into contract with the Government and shall have agreed that this vessel may be taken, purchased, or used by the United States for the national defense, or for any public purpose at any time, in which event, however, provision is made for proper compensation to the All first, second, and third class mail matter must be carried by such ships free. The Shipping Board is given considerable discretion in the making of such contracts and must be satisfied before doing so that the payment of the compensation is reasonably calculated to carry out the purposes of the act. The board may also, within certain limits and for special causes, increase or decrease the compensation allowed.

(8) The act provides the sources of governmental revenue from which the means are to be derived with which to make the payments to vessel owners; it also provides for the coordination and regulation of carriage by rail and by sea, and for concerted action by the Shipping Board and the Interstate Commerce Commission to that end.

(9) Finally, the act requires the shipments of all goods of the United States, including Army and Navy supplies, in American ships whenever practicable.

PREMISES WHICH ARE GENERALLY CONCEDED.

From the foregoing it will be seen that the act is intended in a variety of ways to foster and encourage the creation and maintenance of a privately owned and operated American merchant marine. In its consideration of this measure, your committee started with certain premises upon which, we take it, there is no serious diversity of opinion among patriotic, thinking Americans.

First. America should, if possible, have ships of its own, adequate in time of peace to carry at least a sufficient proportion of its exports and imports to afford protection against foreign interference or domination in our commerce, and adequate in time of war or national emergency to provide a reasonably effective auxiliary to our own Army and Navy.

Second. These ships should be privately owned and operated and should be subjected to as little control and interference by the Government as may be consistent with the public welfare.

It would seem hardly necessary to support these prepositions by argument. Even the minority of the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, which reported adversely upon the bill under consideration, says:

We are opposed to permanent Government ownership or operation of our merchant ships; we favor the sale of them to private owners as soon as practicable, but at such time and in such manner as will protect the public interest and insure the establishment and maintenance of a real American merchant marine

And again:
"We really concede the importance of having an adequate American merchant marine, and we insist that such can be had without imposing upon the American people the tremendous burdens carried in the pending bill."

Unfortunately, the minority fails to suggest how "such can be had," but the significant matter here is the conceded importance of an adequate merchant marine and the insistence that It must be privately owned and operated.

To the premises above stated we may add: Third. That there will in all probability never again be a time in the history of the United States so opportune for the establishment of a merchant marine as the present.

The United States Shipping Board has a fleet of 1,442 steel merchant ships built for or acquired by the Government for the purposes of the late war. This fleet, which is said to have cost over $3,000,000,000, has an aggregate carrying capacity estimated at over 11,000,000 tons. It is true that many of those ships are for various reasons unserviceable. Some of them, in the hurry of war preparation, were poorly built; others are of a type which could not be profitably employed in modern mer-cantile trade; and, in general, there is a lack of balance in the different kinds of tonnage, which would make it necessary to select those ships which are needed and to scrap or otherwise dispose of many others in order to provide a fleet with units so proportioned as to meet the requirements of our modern shipping trade.

It is stated by the chairman of the Shipping Board that 6,000,-000 tons, or a little over half of the steel tonnage now owned by the Government, is "good tonnage, comparable with the best in the world"; the other half ranges from "fair" to "not usable for commercial purposes." It is further stated that 3,000,000 tons probably represents the maximum amount of carrying which, under the most favorable conditions, will be needed for a number of years to round out a merchant fleet as large as can be operated advantageously under the American flag. A certain amount of special tonnage, as, for instance, some of the larger class of passenger carriers, might have to be constructed to complete the program, but, in general, it may be stated that now, for the first time, and in all probability for the last time, in its history, the Nation has on its hands, as a result of the Great War, an ample number of ships already built and ready for service, to meet all the requirements of an efficient merchant marine. What shall we do with these ships? Obviously none of them can be sold to American owners except for the coastwise trade so long as the possibility of Government competition in the foreign carrying trade exists. The Government operated a small part of its enormous fleet last year at a loss of $50,000,000, without taking into account deterioration, hull insurance, or interest on its investment. Making all due allowances for the enormous inefficiency, waste, and extrava-gance which seem to be inseparable from all governmental enterprises, what sane American vessel owner would take one of these ships even as a gift and agree to operate it in the face of such potential competition?

It goes without saying that the Government must go out of the business immediately and permanently, until which time there is no possibility of any privately operated vessels flying the American flag in our foreign trade. A publicly owned fleet is favored by nobody. Those opposed to the pending legislation The alternatives reare most vociferous in its condemnation.

maining are:

(1) To abandon all idea of an American-owned merchant marine in our foreign trade and sell such of the vessels as we can to foreigners and scrap the rest; or

(2) To make some effort to use at least a part of the vast property which we have at hand by placing it in the hands of American owners under conditions which will make it possible for them to compete with the ships of other nations.

There would seem to be no controversy, at least in the Congress, as to which of these alternatives should be adopted, for even the minority report of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee of the House of Representatives contains this ringing declaration concerning the disposition of the ships now owned by the Government:

We favor the sale of them to private owners as soon as practicable, but at such time and in such maner as will protect the public interest and insure the establishment and maintenance of a real American merchant marine for the interest of the whole American people."

We may take it to be conceded, therefore, that everyone wants an American merchant marine. The only question would seem to be how are we to have one? We have the ships, and what is equally important, we have, as a further result of the war, an unprecedented number of trained officers and men to operate them. What, if anything, remains to bring to fruition the wellnigh unanimous desire of the Nation to seize the opportunity offered to place the American flag where it belongs on the high

Your committee is clearly of the opinion that this can not be done without Government aid. The language of the minority report above quoted sounds well, but it is idle, under conditions now existing or to be expected in the near future, to talk of selling any of those ships to be operated under American registry in our foreign trade, unless we are willing as a Nation to remove the handicaps and equalize the costs which now make the operation of American ships in competition with the ships of other nations unprofitable.

In a previous report your committee has pointed out some of the handicaps referred to. Conspicuous among these are the provisions of the so-called La Follette Act, which imposes upon American shipowners many wholly unnecessary burdens, such as the carrying of additional crews and expensive equipment not carried by the ships of other maritime nations. out the removal of these burdens your committee entertains small hope that the provisions of the proposed subsidy bill will suffice to establish American shipping upon the sound footing of equality necessary to meet the keen competition of the world. Even after such removal, however, it seems clear that there will still exist great disadvantages to American ships arising from our higher wage scale for seamen and other costs of operation. Some idea of these disadvantages may be had from a study of Table A, attached to this report, which shows the scale of wages in November, 1921, of each member of the crew of three oil-burning steamers of substantially the same size and type, the first sailing under the American, the second under the British, and the third under the Norwegian flag.

The amounts are in each case reduced to dollars at current rates of exchange. From this table it will be seen that the cost per month of manning the American steamer was $4,037.50; the British steamer, $2,433.90 (or $2,809.08, depending on a difference in exchange rates); and the Norwegian, $1,637.99. In other words, the labor cost of operating the British ship was 70 per cent and the labor cost of operating the Norwegian ship 40 per cent of the labor cost of operating the American Your committee has not at hand the figures showing the comparative labor cost of operating the ships of other countries in the same year, but statistics for 1916 show that American seamen were being paid $45 per month while French seamen received $19.30 per month, and statistics for 1919 show seamen's wages on American ships to be $75 per month; on French ships, $30.88 per month; and on Japanese ships, $20 per month.

Other costs of operation show similar disadvantages to the American shipowner. Thus the average hourly wages of workmen employed on repairs of ships in British yards in 1922 was 31 cents; of the same class of men in American yards, 58 cents. It is estimated by the American Steamship Owners Association that the best figures that can be attained in ordinary operation by an American ship for the food of its crew is 70 cents per day per man. A similar estimate for British (white) crews is about 50 cents per man per day.

The conclusion of the experts employed by the United States Shipping Board is that as between an American ship paying the lowest wages and a British ship of the same size and type, there is a differential of 27 per cent of the pay roll against the American ship in the items of wages and subsistence alone. Allowing 11 months' operation per year this makes an annual excess cost of $9,053 for wages and food alone on an American ship carrying a crew of 40 over a British ship carrying the same complement of officers and men. The difference in cost between the operation of American and Japanese or Norwegian or French ships is, of course, much greater. Without going into the subject further it would seem quite evident that these differences in costs must be counterbalanced if American ships are to be operated without loss. It has been estimated by those who should be in a position to know that the aids provided by the legislation under discussion, together with the comparatively low price at which the Government ships will be sold, will provide counterbalancing advantages sufficient to attract American capital into the shipping business. Chairman Lasker, of the Shipping Board, in his testimony before the House committee says

Of the 6,000,000 tons of (serviceable) freighters the Government possesses it is the hope of the Shipping Board that ultimately a great measure of the 3,000,000 of good tons will find itself in the hands of American owners, should the legislation here proposed be adopted."

We are aware that Mr. Lasker and other witnesses have been criticized for expressing their confidence in the efficiency of the proposed legislation in terms of hope and anticipation rather, than by positive assurances. A sufficient answer to this is that no man can venture to assert positively the success of any business venture, much less of such a remedial measure as this, especially in face of the unusual and complicated situation here presented. The question is also asked in the minority report of the congressional committee why competent vessel owners did not appear before the committee with some kind of guaranty or at least positive opinion that the bill under discussion would accomplish the results desired. Besides the answer above given, two others suggest themselves:

First. If vessel owners had appeared before the committee, would not the opponents of the measure have been as quick to raise the cry of interested motives as they were to accuse the labor leaders who appeared in support of the bill of being in the pay of the "interested" vessel owners?

Second. If, as the opponents of the bill complain, the testimony produced fails to show that American ships can be op-erated successfully with the aid of the subsidies provided, how can it be contended that those ships can be successfully operated without such aid?

There may be doubt as to whether the pending bill will prove effective. If so, are we to abandon all effort to utilize the ships and the services of the sallors we now have at hand, but may never have again? President Harding in his message of November 21, 1922, presents to Congress the three alternatives. says:
"Three courses of action are possible, and the choice among them is no longer to be avoided.

"The first is constructive. Enact the pending bill, under which, I firmly believe, an American merchant marine, privately owned and privately operated, but serving all the people and always available to the Government in any emergency, may be established and maintained.

The second is obstructive. Continue Government operations and attending Government losses, and discourage private enterprise by Government competition, under which losses are met by the Public Treasury, and witness the continued losses and deterioration until the colossal failure ends in sheer exhaustion.

"The third is destructive, involving the sacrifice of our ships abroad or the scrapping of them at home, the surrender of our aspirations, and the confession of our impotence to the world in general, and our humiliation before the competing world in particular.

"A choice among the three is inevitable. It is unbelievable that the American people or the Congress which expresses their power will consent to surrender and destruction. It is equally unbelievable that our people and the Congress which translates their wishes into action will longer sustain a program of ob-struction and attending losses to the Treasury.

"I have come to urge the constructive alternative, to re-assert an American 'We will.' I have come to ask you to relieve the responsible administrative branch of the Government from a program upon which failure and hopelessness and staggering losses are written for every page, and let us turn to a program of assured shipping to serve us in war and to give guaranty to our commercial independence in peace.

Your committee believes that the experiment, if experiment it be, is worth trying.

OTHER OBJECTIONS CONSIDERED.

All the arguments against the subsidy bill can hardly be marshaled within the necessary limits of this report. A few of the principal ones may, however, be briefly reviewed.

1) There is among many people a strong prejudice against subsidies in any form. In a case like the present one, however, this feeling hardly rises to the dignity of an argument. Too many forms of subsidy are being granted every day under various names to the very people who protest most loudly against this measure. The Government pays out enormous sums of money each year for the improvement of rivers and harbors and inland waterways, which are a subsidy to the locality or in-terests affected. Our rural free delivery is a subsidy to the farmer. We have subsidized railroads by land grants. We have recently authorized $75,000,000 for good roads for market highways. We have subsidized the agriculture of the country by large sums for reclamation and irrigation, and we spend in the Federal Agricultural Department many millions of dollars in sending out literature and seeds, large sums in investigations and experiments for the benefit of manufacture and agriculture, and have recently been perfecting extensive systems for loaning money to farmers, all of which could be properly classified as subsidies. In reality they are for the most part Government aid to enterprise which could not, or at least would not, be undertaken if left to private initiative.

(2) It is urged that the Shipping Board is given powers by the proposed act, such as the fixing of routes and the regulation of subsidy rates, which may lead to favoritism and even corrup-tion. The answer to this is that Government regulation has become common and indeed necessary in many departments of our national activity. The Interstate Commerce Commission has national activity. powers in the exercise of which favoritism and even corruption would doubtless be possible, but who has ever found valid objection to that body upon that ground?

(3) It is charged that the proposed legislation gives over our American shipping into the hands of large corporate "interests" which may enrich themselves at the public expense. In the minority report of the congressional committee it is de-manded that the ships belonging to the Government "be sold in such manner as to protect the public interest and insure the establishment and maintenance of a real American mer-chant marine for the interest of the whole American people, so as to prevent our ships from falling into the hands of a large syndicate, or our merchant ships being controlled by a few large companies which would drive out of business the smaller companies and numerous trade routes."

In the first place, your committee fails to find anything in the proposed legislation which is intended to or would have the effects feared. There would seem to be no reason why a small operator could not obtain the same benefits under the subsidy as a large one, and if he fails in his enterprise, it would be for reasons other than any disadvantage imposed upon him by the law. The provisions for supervision and control would, moreover, appear to be sufficient to prevent serious abuse. If in practical operation they are found to be insufficient, Congress at all times has the remedy in its own hands.

In the second place, the bill provides that shipping lines receiving Government aid must have their actual investment and their operating expenses audited by the Government, that Government aid will only be paid until the shipping enterprise earns 10 per cent on the actual capital employed, and that immediately, when more than 10 per cent is reached, half of the excess earnings must be applied to the repayment of the Government aid which has been previously advanced. Thus, the possible earnings are limited to a very reasonable amount if capital is to be risked and management is to be attracted. If success attends, the Government outlay is returned; if not, there would certainly seem to be very little chance of enriching large corporations or anybody else.

In the third place, if the objection implies that its proposers would favor the exclusion of large companies from participation in the benefits offered by the legislation, your committee has no sympathy therewith. To own and operate a single ship requires an investment which is beyond the reach of most individuals. A line of steamers or an effective fleet with the necessary terminals and connections almost necessarily presupposes a combination of considerable capital in corporate form. To prohibit or discourage such combinations be-yond the provisions of the laws now existing for the prevention of monopoly would defeat the entire object in view. Your committee can not but regard this objection as ill considered and probably calculated merely as an attempted appeal to popular prejudice.

(4) It has been suggested that the proposed measure means in practical effect a continuance of Government ownership and management; that the sale of the ships under its pro-visions will necessarily be upon small down payments, with security which will require constant governmental supervision; and that this, combined with the regulation of routes and rates and the constant auditing and attention required to ascertain the amount of subsidy earned by each ship, will constitute a degree of supervision tantamount to control, and carry with it the expensive disadvantage inherent in Government operation.

Your committee is unable to agree with this conclusion, Doubtless the cost of the oversight required under the act will constitute a considerable charge upon the Public Treasury, though it should certainly not be so great as the overhead charges for similar purposes attending Government ownership and operation of the fleet; but the supervision necessary under the act to the protection of the Government upon mortgages or other forms of security for installments of unpaid purchase price and upon the remission of income taxes and payment of subsidies is not of a kind which involves the disadvantages of Government ownership and operation. These disadvantages arise principally from two causes:

First, the fact that responsibility rests upon public officials having no financial interest in the success or failure of the enterprise and subject more or less to political and other influences which destroy incentive and paralyze individual initlative; and, second, to the unbusinesslike routing and red tape which seems to be a necessary concomitant of public administration. Neither of these causes would be present in the operation of ships sold and belonging to private owners. The bill proposes no interference with that independence of action which gives the operator full power to organize and conduct his business as private concerns are organized and conducted.

It seems to your committee that this objection arises from a confusion of the ideas of regulation on the one hand and management on the other. We are all familiar with and are now more or less reconciled to the regulation of our railroads and their supervision by the Government; that regulation may at times approach to interference with certain functions sup-posed to inhere in private control and management, but (ex-cept during the war emergency) that interference has never gone so far as to substitute Government for private management.

At all events, whatever interference has occurred, and some of us may think it has been unnecessarily great, has arisen from the assumed necessity for regulating public carriers, adjusting the relations of capital and labor, and other general consideration of public policy which would probably be invoked against any threatened invasion of the interest of the public in any department of our commercial life which is subject to public regulation; at all events, it is certainly not peculiar to this legislation.

If we are to have a merchant marine of any kind, under any conditions, it will be subject to more or less regulation. The degree of supervision required under the plan proposed in this bill would seem to be no more than is necessary for the protection of the Government and the public, and not enough to menace that freedom of private management which is necessary to economical and efficient operation.

(5) Probably the most serious objection to this legislation, and one which under present conditions merits the most careful consideration, is the expense which it will involve. Our citizens are already overburdened with taxes. Many proposals of public expenditure otherwise meritorious are being rejected for this reason. Our most pressing commercial and individual need is the reduction of this burden wherever possible. Its increase can only be justified by the most urgent reasons of public policy. Under such conditions is an American merchant marine worth what it will cost?

The Shipping Board in its study of this subject (p. 176) says: "It is estimated that the total annual expenditure for the differential payments for the entire American merchant marine in foreign trade five years hence, when the fleet has symmetrically developed to a total of 7,500,000 gross tons, capable of carrying about one-half of the exports and imports of the country, will not be in excess of $30,000.000. For the first year the annual expenditure will be about $15,000,000, and this annual amount will increase gradually as the results of a national policy of encouragement to shipping are realized and improved types of new steamers are completed and commissioned. The maximum payment to American ships from direct aid is, as above stated, $30,000,000. Of this amount the base aid to all vessels will approximate $15,000,000, while the additional aid to the high-speed vessels and liners, most of which are not to-day in existence, will absorb the other $15,000,000.

"It should be noted that the Government will have full use of these vessels for carrying the mail without additional expense, an offset of nearly $5,000.000. Further, against this cost to the Government might properly be set the saving in the next fiscal year of $50,000,000 in operating losses which the board will probably incur if it does not promptly dispose of its shipsa saving that will be impossible if American operators are not induced to buy these ships through the assurance of the full measure of Government aid. Against this cost should be set down the appreciation in the value of Shipping Board tonnage that would undoubtedly result from the grant of the indirect aids proposed herein over the prices that could be obtained without such aid. Without the assurance which the Government aids would give, a large part of the Shipping Board tonnage might not be sold for several years, if ever. The appreciation in value referred to would undoubtedly amount to many millions of dollars. The saving in interest on the present mar-ket value of the entire Shipping Board fleet and the avoidance of the extraordinary depreciation that is running against the laid-up portion of the fleet as well as the expenses incurred in connection with that idle tonnage would amount to many millions more."

The minority of the House committee questions the savings predicted by the Shipping Board, especially the saving of $50,000,000 in operating expenses, if the ships are not promptly disposed of, pointing out that all of this amount does not represent operating losses, but that part of it would persist under the proposed program. There are other criticisms of the Shipping Board's figures which, in view of the matter which the committee takes, it would be futile to discuss here. Suffice it to say that a considerable saving of the amount necessary to afford the direct aid proposed by the bill would unquestionably be effected. Your committee is especially impressed with the suggestion that much higher prices will probably be obtained for the ships, which everyone agrees must be sold or scrapped, if American purchasers have before them the prospect of the promised aids to profitable operation. It seems reasonably clear that without this there will be no American purchasers, at least for our foreign trade, and the ships will have to be sold for what we can get in foreign markets or scrapped—most likely the latter. While no prediction can or should at this time be made as to the outcome of the offer of such an enormous tonnage on the market, it would not seem unreasonable that the prices obtained would be considerably improved by the pending legislation, and it is not beyond the bounds of possibility that the saving thus effected might alone be sufficient to pay the direct subsidy outlay for years to come.

As to the cost of the indirect aids provided by the act, the Shipping Board says (page 185 of the "Study"):

In estimating the cost of the above indirect aids, it is evident that the only measures that will involve any cost to the Government are those that provide for a deduction from net Federal income tax of 5 per cent of the freight money paid mous program of certain waste and destruction.

shippers using American ships and the provision for the establishment and maintenance of the merchant marine naval reserve. None of the other measures would consume any Government funds except the relatively small amounts required for administrative expenses.

"The loss in revenue from income tax of a deduction of a portion of the freight money paid by persons using American ships would probably not be more than $6,000,000 in the next fiscal year, since the volume of available tonnage, together with the level of freight rates, will probably be quite low in the coming year. Moreover, the freight on a considerable part of the traffic carried in American ships will be paid abroad, since a large part of our exports are sold f. o. b. United States ports, while a large part of our imports are sold on c. i. f. basis, meaning that the seller pays costs, insurance, and freight. In subsequent years, with the probable increase not only in the total volume of tonnage but also in the proportion carried in American ships, it is probable that the loss in direct revenue on account of this deduction would increase and might rise to a maximum of $10,000,000 per annum.

The cost of the merchant marine naval reserve, it is estimated, would not be more than $650,000 in the first year, but would probably increase to a maximum of $3,000,000 per annum within the next five years as the reserve developed to the desired proportions.

"As nearly as can be estimated at the present time, the total cost to the Government of the application of the entire list of indirect aids enumerated above would be in the first year about $6,000,000 for income-tax exemption to shippers and $650,000 for the maintenance of the merchant marine naval reserve, or a total of about $7,000,000, and within five years to about $13,000.000—$10,000,000 on account of income-tax exemption and $3,000,000 on account of the naval reserve.

"In addition to these sums, which can be directly approximated, there will be an apparent loss to the Treasury due to the waiving of income taxes of shipowners both on the earnings of their active fleet and upon the sale of vessels built prior to 1914. It is impossible to make an estimate of what these apparent losses will amount to because they are so dependent upon the future of the shipping industry.

It must not be forgotten that many of these apparent losses will be offset, if not exceeded, by the amounts of revenue that they will cause to flow into the country and into the Treasury. For example, while the Treasury may lose a matter of $10,-000,000 in deductions from income taxes on account of freight paid to American ships, each dollar so deducted represents $20 paid to American shipowners in freights. These freights will help to produce profits upon which the shipowners will pay income taxes, probably aggregating in excess of the $10,000,000 deducted by the shippers.

"The discontinuance of operation by the Government of the military transportation services will undoubtedly result in an actual saving, although owing to the manner in which governmental departments keep books this may not be apparent from their figures. If overhead, insurance, and depreciation were charged for, and if the capital investment were carried at even Government rates of interest, the results would be probably alarming.

"When these items are considered as they properly should be, it will be found that private lines can render adequate service at much lower rates."

Notwithstanding certain criticisms to which the foregoing statement has been subjected, it does not seem to your committee that it is unreasonable to accept its general conclusions. Your committee is not, therefore, prepared to believe that the cost to the Public Treasury of putting into effect the provisions of the proposed legislation will prove to be anywhere near as much as its critics forebode. But even assuming that the anticipations of the Shipping Board as to such cost should be disappointed and an expense largely in excess of the estimates should be incurred, are we ready to accept the only apparent alternative, which is to abandon all idea of carrying any of our foreign trade in American ships, give up the only opportunity we may ever have to utilize the more than ample numbers of ships already on hand, and the large body of seamen already trained, and sell to foreigners at gift prices, or abandon to the scrap heap, without an effort at salvage, a fleet of ships which cost $3,000,000,000? Even granting all the doubts which may reasonably be entertained as to whether the pro-posed legislation will accomplish the desired result, it would still seem that the cost of trying the experiment proposed would be small compared with the alternative involved in this enorVALUE OF A MERCHANT MARINE TO THE NATIONAL DEFENSE,

We have not thus far presented any of the numerous reasons which exist for the creation and maintenance of a national merchant marine. The agreement of all parties to the controversy that one is desirable if not necessary to the upbuilding of our foreign trade seems to make any argument upon this head unnecessary

Before closing this report, however, your committee desires to call attention to one phase of the problem, which, though doubtless much in the minds of the officers of the Federal Government who are charged with the serious duty of national defense in time of war, has not been given as much prominence as it seems to deserve in the hearings before the committee of the House of Representatives. Perhaps this was due to the reluctance of all parties to admit the possibility of another war in future, but, in view of world conditions to-day, failure to recognize such a possibility would seem to be sheer improvidence.

The very fact that this country was caught at the outbreak of the late war with no means of transporting its troops and no means of carrying supplies by sea, either to its Army or Navy, and that it was, therefore, not only obliged to expend in a hasty and necessarily extravagant program of shipbullding the gigantic sum of $3,000,000,000, but that the very existence of civilization stood in jeopardy while this program was being carried out, should certainly cause thoughtful Americans to consider carefully the means for the prevention of a recurrence of such an enormous national, not to say world, peril.

It is needless to say that a navy is powerless without an auxiliary fleet for the carriage of men and supplies. Swift auxiliary vessels are also necessary in many phases of actual warfare, especially in the suppression of depredations upon the commerce of the nation. And carrying capacity such as can only be provided in practice by merchant ships is necessary for the transportation of troops, munitions, and supplies. The possible extent of the requirements for these purposes in certain emergencies may be gauged by the number of such ships we had to build for the late war.

With a standing Army and Navy of a certain fixed size, it would seem not simply desirable but necessary in the exercise of ordinary common sense to provide and keep in training at least a sufficient number of these auxiliary ships and their crews to meet the probable requirements of our regular establishment. The vessels engaged in our coastwise trade are not sufficient either in size or number to approach these requirements, much less to provide a reserve for emergencies.

The proposed legislation is admirably calculated to supply adequately and continuously without cost to the Government other than the aids which are justified by other purposes a large auxiliary fleet of carriers which the Government can call into service on short notice. It will, moreover, keep in training a considerable body of sallors who can be drawn upon if need be to supply seamen for the Navy itself.

Even though the purely economic advantages of the pending measure were less apparent, it seems to your committee that the necessity for some such means of creating a merchant marine for purposes of national defense should be conclusive in its favor. Other means may exist, but thus far have not been suggested. Unless and until some other plan is proposed, promising equal chance of accomplishing the desired results, the pending legislation, we believe, offers the only acceptable alternative.

RECOMMENDATION.

For the reasons stated your committee recommends that the directors of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce take such appropriate action by resolution and otherwise as will express the approval of the measure under consideration by this institution.

It is further recommended that copies of the resolutions adopted by the board and printed copies of this report be sent immediately to all members of the Senate and House of Representatives at Washington, with a letter urging the passage of the bill; and that this chamber cooperate in support of the measure with the chambers of commerce of other cities in such manner as may be deemed advisable.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the subsidy bill is dead. Its decease is admitted by the chairman in charge of the bill, the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones], due to the filibuster. The only question now left for the Senate to determine with reference to this bill is the place of its burial. For some reason, our Democratic friends apparently are not willing that it be buried anywhere, or to permit the filled milk bill to come before the Senate, for which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Ladd] has now been patiently sitting in his seat waiting for the opportunity to make a motion for many days.

Mr. President, the Democrats desire the burial to take place in the Committee on Commerce. The chairman of the committee desires that the bill be buried in the calendar. It is entirely immaterial to me where it is buried; but it does seem to me that we ought now to proceed to consider other bills upon the calendar, and I do think that the chairman of the committee ought to have the privilege of designating the place of the burial of this bill. So I shall vote against recommittal. I shall then vote to take up the filled milk bill, on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I had not expected to make any remarks on the motion to recommit. The statement just made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot], however, coupled with the statement made earlier in the day by the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones], prompts me to submit a few considerations in connection with this motion.

I have been ready for a vote on this motion for more than two days. It is well known that the Senator from Washington announced Saturday morning that he recognized the fact that the bill had been defeated. It seemed to me when he made that declaration that the Senate should at once take action to clear the bill from its proceedings, and take up other measures; and I then asked unanimous consent to vote upon a motion to recommit. That consent was denied; another motion was pending, the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill; and upon a vote the Senate took up the bill for further consideration. The motion to recommit was then made.

Mr. President, notwithstanding the fact that an effort is being made to induce Senators on the other side of the Chamber who are at heart against the ship subsidy bill, and whose course during the consideration of the measure has contributed to its defeat, to refrain now from giving it a decent burial; notwithstanding the declaration of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot] that the chairman of the committee who reported this bill ought to have the privilege of determining the place of its burial, I say that there are substantial reasons why this measure ought to find a last resting place in the committee that gave it birth.

In the first place, the principal opposition to this bill, the ground upon which the passage of the bill has become impossible, grows out of amendments reported by the Commiftee on Commerce. I refer specifically to what is known as the Madden amendment.

The great Republican leader in the body at the other end of the Capitol, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, realizing the fact that it is unfair, oppressive, and unjust to fasten upon the American people for a period of 15 years the burdens imposed by this bill, sought to retain in the Congress of the United States the right of annual appropriation, so that at least some control might be retained by the representatives of the people over money which this bill will waste. The Committee on Commerce repudiated the attitude of the Republican majority in the House of Representatives. brought into the Senate of the United States an amendment which proposes to tie the hands of the representatives of the American people; and that action was taken in spite of the fact that in the last election the bill was repudiated by the overwhelming vote of the American people.

The President thought enough of the ship-subsidy proposition to convene this Congress in extraordinary session to consider it-a Congress many Members of which had been defeated by their constituencies. If the President still thinks that this measure ought to pass, he can convene the Congress in extraordinary session on the 5th of March, and then the American people will have an opportunity of knowing whether their representatives, many of them chosen with direct reference to this issue, are in favor of the passage of the bill. There is not the slightest doubt that if this bill is recommitted to the committee, and an extra session of Congress is called to consider ship-subsidy legislation, the bill will not be reported in the form in which it is presented here, if indeed it is ever

Another thing: It is proposed, by an amendment submitted to the committee, expressly to give the power to make contracts that shall extend over a period of 15 years. What is the object of that provision? The sole object is to make contracts, long-term contracts, by virtue of the authority of the present Congress, that could not receive approval under the next Con-If the President is willing to take into consideration the reflected sentiment of the American people as expressed in the and if Members on the other side of the Chamber are willing to do that, they should consent that this bill go back to the committee; and if the President thinks it is as important now as he thought last fall, he can call an extra session to consider the ship subsidy bill; and I, for one, would be willing to agree that a vote might be had within 30 days. If an extra session is not called for the consideration of this bill, you may know and the people may understand that the reason why such action is not taken is because the Executive realizes that this bill has been whipped to a frazzle, defeated in the conscience and judgment of the American people, as well as defeated in the conscience and judgment of the Senators composing a majority in this body.

There is not a good-faith majority in the Senate of the United States in favor of this bill. Senators may decline to go upon record, if they choose to do so, upon the motion to recommit. The fact remains that the bill never has had in good faith the enthusiastic support of the majority Members of this

The fact is that many of them have hesitated between loyalty to the President and their duty to their constituents; that the debates have disclosed that this measure will not accomplish the purpose sought to be accomplished. They have disclosed the purpose sought to be accomplished. They have disclosed that it is a pitiable subterfuge. It ought not to have been brought forward in an extra session, in view of the sentiment reflected by the electors of the Nation last November. The President did seek to drive the bill through the present Congress, composed in part of Members who had been defeated on this very issue, because he knows the next Congress will not pass it. The conclusive evidence of that statement is that he called the present Congress in extraordinary session to consider the ship subsidy bill, and he does not contemplate calling the next Congress in extra session to consider it or a similar

Within a week before the Congress is to adjourn the Executive sent to the Senate a message asking the Senate to take action contemplating participation by this Government in the Permanent Court of International Justice established under the auspices of the League of Nations. The representatives of the majority party in this Chamber have taken no action, and they contemplate no procedure looking to a decision respecting the question submitted in the President's message. Since the subject is of great importance in the mind of the Executive, the Senate can be convened in extraordinary session on the 5th of March and this subject, with ship-subsidy legislation, can be taken up and acted upon. No such proposition, however, is made. An extra session was called during the present Congress to consider the ship subsidy bill in anticipation of its probable defeat by the incoming Congress. There is not a Senator familiar with political conditions in this Nation, familiar with the sentiment that exists touching the subject matter of this legislation, but who knows that the pending bill can not be passed during the next Congress; and the sole justification for attempting to pass it through this Congress, to the exclusion and rejection of other legislation admittedly necessary and wholesome in the public interest, is the fact that it can not be passed and become effective under any action which the new Congress may be expected to take.

With these considerations in mind, the Senate committee having repudiated the policy adopted by the House of Representatives, which is overwhelmingly Republican, the Senate committee having reported an amendment which permanently appropriates every dollar of the merchant marine fund before any portion of it has accumulated, and having reported another amendment which permits the execution of 15-year contracts. it now boldly declares that there is no justification for this body to repudiate its action in those particulars and send the bill back to it, to the end that it may revise its conclusions in conformity to the well-known sentiment of the American people and in conformity to the action of the House of Representatives. overwhelmingly Republican-action taken at the instance of the Republican leaders of the Senate.

You can refuse to recommit the bill if you want to, because you have the votes. The proposal of the Senator from Washington is that if you vote against the motion to recommit he and his close associates will vote to take up some other bill which some of you are in favor of. Since the bill is dead, it matters little how or where it is buried, but you must answer to the members of your own party in the body at the other end of the Capitol for seeking to impose upon the country for a period of 15 years, in violation of the expressed wishes of the people, the obligations of this bill.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I understand the Senate would like to take a vote, and if we are to vote upon this motion I am willing to yield the floor, on condition that I be permitted to speak immediately afterwards on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota. I would like to inquire if any Senator desires to speak at this time on this particular subject? The reason I am led to make the inquiry is that I have been waiting for a long time to get the floor, and it seems that this discussion will continue all afternoon. If that is the fact, I want to take advantage of the recognition which I have now secured to make a speech which I intended to make, but if we can have a vote I am willing to yield the floor, provided I may be recognized immediately after the vote to speak on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota. I ask unanimous consent that I be recognized immediately after the vote on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota. On that condition I yield the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana has the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thought the consent had been granted, Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BROUSSARD, I would like to have an understanding before I yield the floor. I just made a request for unanimous consent, and the Chair has not submitted my request. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator state his request again?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I ask unanimous consent that the Chair recognize me immediately after the vote is taken on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota to take up the filled milk

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have no objection in the world to that; I want to hear the Senator now. But if that carries with it the idea that no further debate can be had on this motion-

Mr. BROUSSARD. I do not mean to preclude any speeches, Mr. SWANSON. Recognition is in the control of the Chair, and the Chair can assure the Senator that if he will yield for vote now he will recognize him after the vote is taken.

Mr. NORRIS. I am unwilling to agree by unanimous consent that at a certain time in the future some Senator may be recognized to speak on a certain motion. It may be that the Senator from North Dakota may want to be recognized.

Mr. WATSON. I suggest to the Senator from Louisiana that if he wisbes to speak, he speak now on this question. The probabilities are that I shall want to make some observations on this myself, and I do not care to ask to have the time farmed out to me on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana is recognized

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment? I desire to present a matter of morning business.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield,

PRODUCTION OF HABIT-FORMING NARCOTIC DRUGS.

Mr. LODGE. I report back from the Committee on Foreign Relations favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 453) requesting the President to urge upon the governments of certain nations the immediate necessity of limiting the production of habit-forming narcotic drugs and the raw materials from which they are made to the amount actually required for strictly medicinal and scientific purposes, and I submit a report (Rept. No. 1234) thereon. This is identical with a bill which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and which the committee has considered. that the joint resolution may go on to the calendar.

Mr. POMERENE. Do I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts is going to ask for action upon it?

Mr. LODGE. No; not at this moment. I ask that it may go to the calendar,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

FEES FOR VISÉ OF PASSPORTS.

Mr. LODGE. I report back unanimously from the Committee on Foreign Relations the bill (S. 4609) to authorize the President, in certain cases, to reduce the fees for the visé of It is a very short bill, and if the Senator from Louisiana will allow me I should like to ask for immediate action on it because it is very important that action should be taken before final adjournment.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield for that purpose.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, in the cases of aliens desiring to visit the United States temporarily for a period not to exceed one year, for business or pleasure, to reduce the passport vise fees to an amount not less than $2. including the application fee: Provided, That similar provisions are made by the governments of the countries from which such allens come in favor of American nationals desiring to visit such countries temporarily under similar conditions.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMERICAN INTERESTS IN SMYRNA.

Mr. LODGE. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of State in regard to our marines and sailors at Smyrna. It has reference to some questions that were asked in debate the other day when the Armenian bill was under consideration.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 26, 1923.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 26, 1923.

The Hon. Henry Cabot Lodge:
United States Senate.

My Dear Senator Lodge: I have received your letter of February 24 in which you brought to my attention the report in the Congressional Record of February 23 (p. 4339) of the discussion of a bill to admit certain refugees from Turkey, during which certain questions relating to this Government's policy in the Near East were raised. I take pleasure in submitting herowith information which may be helpful in answering the specific questions asked.

(1) "What is the condition of the building in Smyrna formerly occupied by the American consular staff?"

The fire which devastated a large section of Smyrna destroyed the quarter of the city where the majority of the foreign consulates were located. The building occupied by Consul General Horton and his staff as the American consulate general was among those so destroyed. This fire occurred on September 13 last.

As the consulate building was destroyed in the general conflagration it is not possible to attribute the destruction of this particular building to the individual act of any person or persons. As far as the department is informed, the authors of the fires, apparently of incendiary origin, which brought on the Smyrna conflagration have never been apprehended nor their identity discovered. On this point conflicting evidence has been received by the department and the various antagonistic racial groups in Smyrna have each ascribed the origin of the fire to the other. However, the Turkish military authorities in occupation of Smyrna can scarcely avoid responsibility for their failure to maintain order in Smyrna, which undoubtedly was one of the contributory causes for the extent of the disaster.

(2) "Has cruelty been inflicted on American sailors or marines; and, if so, when, by whom, and to what extent?"

No American marines were present at Smyrna during the disaster. One or more American destroyers were in Smyrna harbor during and subsequent to the fire, the number varying from one to three at various times. Landing parties of American blue lackets were stationed at various points throughout the city as a safeguard for American citizens and their property, in particular to guard the rendezvous where Americans were assembled previous to their avacuation, and to protect the American Collegiate Institute at Smyrna and other property of American citizens. The department is not informed that any American sailors were injured during the fire. One blue lacket on guard at an American institution, the International College, near Smyrna, was roughly handled by Turkish brigands, rescued by a Turkish officer, and did not suffer any permanent injury.

(3) "What action has been taken by the Executive to protect American citizens from injury and death, and what action has been taken to protect the American flag from insult?"

This inquiry is in part answered by the preceding paragraph. American citizens were promptly evacuated from Smyrna on an American destroyer and an American Shipping Board vessel under the protection of a destroyer. The department is not informed that the American flag suffered insult. Notwithstanding the extraordinary condition which prevailed in Smyrna, due to a fire of almost unprecedented violence, the termination of a military campaign which had aroused racial and nationalist feelings to the highest pitch, and a general tendency to disregard the sauctity of life and property on the part of both victor and vanquished, the reports which the department has received indicate that the American flag in Smyrna was respected and that it served as a rallying point not only for American citizens but to the oppressed and the needy. The record of American citizens but to the oppressed and the needy. The record of American citizens but to the oppressed and the needy. The record of American citizens but to the oppressed and the needy. The record of American citizens but to the oppressed and the needy. The record of American citizens but to EXCHANGES OF PROPERTY UNDER REVENUE ACT OF 1921.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on House bill 13774. The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Wadsworth in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13774) to amend the revenue act of 1921 in respect to exchanges of property, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. McCumber, Mr. Smoot, and Mr. Jones of New Mexico conferees on the part of the Senate.

CREDITS AND REFUND UNDER REVENUE ACT OF 1921.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13775) to amend the revenue act of 1921 in respect to credits and refunds, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, and that the Presiding Officer appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. McCumbea, Mr. Smoot, and Mr. Gerry as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

BELLS FOR GRACE CHURCH, PLAINFIELD, N. J.

Mr. McCUMBER. From the Committee on Finance I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4639) to remit the duty on a carillon of bells to be imported for Grace Church, Plainfield, N. J., and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I stated a little while ago that I would not permit business of this kind to be brought in until the pending question on the shipping bill was disposed of. Senate does not seem to desire to dispose of the pending motion, and, so far as I am concerned. I am not going to object to anything anyone wants to bring up by unanimous consent. So if other Senators do not object, the bill can be considered.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as fol-

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to admit free of duty a certain carillon of bells to be imported for Grace Church, Plainfield, N. J.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

PRODUCTION OF GASOLINE AND DENATURED ALCOHOL.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I have been waiting for a couple of days for the final disposition of the shipping bill. realized that the measure was dead, and, although still willing to vote on any motion consistent with the way I voted in the beginning, I was willing to let the matter pass out so that we might take up other matters.

This is not a matter which pertains to the shipping bill. Every speech that has been made since Saturday has been a discussion of the shipping bill. The matter about which I desire to speak properly would come on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota to take up the filled milk bill, or any other agricultural bill. It is one which I think should directly and very forcibly interest those Senators who in this body belong to the agricultural bloc.

All of us realize the conditions which exist in this country in agricultural pursuits. In fact, since I have been here I have very gladly joined those who proposed legislation for the relief of the farmers, and the record we have made is to be commended. Among some of the acts we have passed is one approved August 24, 1921, to amend the War Finance Corporation act so as to provide relief for producers and dealers in agricultural products. That was later amended, on June 10, 1921, so that the act was extended for the benefit of the farmers.

We also amended the antitrust laws so as to permit farmers, by means of cooperative associations, to market collectively their products without violating the antitrust laws of this country. This body has voted on two other measures proposing relief to farmers, providing credit facilities for agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States, to amend the Federal farm loan act, and to amend the Federal reserve act.

There have been many other similar measures, passed or pending, or acted upon by this present Senate. We have been looking around to help the farmer, and the Senator from North Dakota now proposes a measure which is known as the filled milk bill. It only demonstrates to what extent we are racking our brains and thinking over what other legislation could be adopted in order to encourage the farmer and to make agricultural pursuits more profitable.

There is one thing, however, which the people of the United States have entirely overlooked. In the discussions of the bills we have passed in this body many times reference has been made to the fact that we may try to remedy conditions and may amend our laws, but until market facilities are better, until we create a demand for the agricultural products, no results will be obtained. Those arguments have directed my attention to efforts of finding in some way, or of creating in this country, a new market for agricultural products. I should not say a new market, but to restore to their legitimate markets certain agricultural products which have been absolutely outlawed, not by the Constitution, not even by the acts of Congress, but by the regulations putting into force the laws adopted to enforce certain sumptuary measures.

Senators may think this statement is very trivial, but I do want to say this, that I have thought this matter out very seriously, and I think I have some interesting facts to submit, in which the agricultural people of this country are most vitally concerned, and in which the entire population of the United States are likewise interested.

I shall not discuss prohibition. I have discussed that here-tofore. I do not intend to touch upon that subject. I am going to limit myself to the industrial side of this question, and I have here facts and figures which I think will demonstrate to any reasonable man the correctness of the position which I have taken, and which I shall submit to the Senate.

It will be admitted that the eighteenth amendment never was intended to interfere with industrial alcohol in the country. To substantiate that I shall read section 1 of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territories subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

It will be noticed that not only did the eighteenth amendment not intend to deny the right to manufacture alcoholic spirits but that its restrictions were limited to beverages which were in fact intoxicating. I take the position that the Congress of the United States, in attempting to carry out the spirit of the Constitution, recognized that very fact by providing in its legislation that the manufacture of alcohol for industrial purposes did not come within the purview of the constitutional amendment; and they thereby recognized what everybody in the country knew to be a fact, and what the proponents of the amendment to the Constitution conceded during the long debate which preceded for many years the adoption of the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. President, in the debate on the Willis-Campbell bill in 1921 I made a statement to which I wish to call attention at this time. When the House bill came to the Senate and there were so many proposed restrictions placed upon the legitimate uses of industrial alcohol, I was unable to understand the reason for it, and I made the statement on the floor of the Senate-and anybody interested may look it up and ascertain that I am now stating in a very few sentences what I stated then at lengththat there were certain interests who were directly concerned in the elimination of industrial alcohol as an economic product in the United States. I went further. I made the statement that Mr. Rockefeller was not to be credited entirely with a humanitarian spirit in the contributions which he made to the prohibition cause, but that he himself was more largely interested than anybody else in the United States in so interpreting the United States Constitution and the acts of Congress as to eliminate from manufacture alcohol, which was then demonstrated to be the future competitor of his product—gasoline. At that time many Senators on the floor smiled at my statement. I think it was the Senator from Florida [Mr. Tram-MELL] who interrupted me, probably wishing in a spirit of fun to heckle me. I would rather believe that than that he was Ignorant of the fact that alcohol was the probable successful competitor as fuel for motor engines, light, and heat.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. When the Senator was talking about Mr. Rockefeller's contributions, is he sure that it was not Mr. W. H. Anderson who smiled?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Probably he also smiled, although if that caused him to smile, he has since ceased to smile as I understand the situation from the press.

But I want to take up the question as a serious industrial economic matter of great importance to the country. I am satisfied that I am just as sincere in this proposition as I ever was on any other. I am satisfied moreover that all the ills affecting agriculture which the Congress of the United States tried to cure by legislation passed in the last 20 years combined is insignificant compared to the result flowing from the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment, as I shall demonstrate by facts and figures which I have obtained from the United States departments which have these matters under their jurisdiction and which will furnish the information to anybody.

At the time I made that statement I saw in the regulations presented to us under the amendment to the Volstead law all sorts of restrictions placed not only upon the people who manufactured alcohol that was potable and not denounced by the eighteenth amendment, but also upon alcohol that was denatured and which, under the regulations issued by the department, were violent poisons. Notwithstanding the fact that the denatured alcohols were deadly poisons, there were many, many regulations which were issued for the very purpose of preventing the use of industrial or denatured alcohol as a competitor of gasoline.

I recalled the fact that the Congress of the United States long before had recognized the fact that alcohol was a most valuable product and that England and all the other leading nations, principally Germany, had recognized the fact and were then encouraging the production of industrial alcohol as a fuel for motive power as well as a valuable source of heat I recalled that before the prohibition act went into effect alcohol was worth about 10 cents a gallon and gasoline 8 cents a gallon. I recalled the fact that the corn producers of the country often burned their corn as a substitute for coal. All of those facts so interested me that I made the statement here that I really believed the motive behind those regulations was to prevent the development of industrial alcohol as a competitor of gasoline.

Mr. President, every one of us realizes the fact that there is no discussion of a treaty among the nations of the world to-day that can be confected without considering the petroleum conditions of the territory affected. France and England differed immediately when certain nations were placed under their protectorate, and they have not been able to solve the Mesopotamian situation because of the oil that is involved there. As it is not visible to the Englishmen and Frenchmen, they have deferred the settlement of it, each nation thinking that it might get the worst, not of surface conditions, not of fertility of soil, not of forests that are there, not of mines that are known, but because of the fact that oil is beneath the soil and no one knows just where it is.

Who in this country can ignore the fact that every revolution for the last 40 years in Mexico has been instigated by the large oil corporations of the world, which have reached into Mexico and have tried not only to grab the oil lands that were not previously sold by the Mexican Government but have tried to crowd out all other nationals from Mexican territory? know ourselves that the problem at the root of the refusal of this Government to recognize the Government of Mexico is that the State Department under this administration is insisting that a certain article of the constitution of Mexico be repealed, because Americans who own oil lands in Mexico claim that their rights will be jeopardized unless that is done. They were powerful enough to prevent this Government, not only the present administration but the previous one, from recognizing the Government of Mexico due to that very fact. We know that every civilized nation is now looking to Russia to try to get hold of oil fields and oil territory

These are conditions about which all of us know. It is not anything new or anything that people do not know that I wish to present. I merely want to get the people to understand exactly what we have been doing in this country and what we are guilty of at the present time,

Mr. President, we are large importers of petroleum ourselves. I have here a long statement from the United States Geological Survey that I shall not read. I merely want to show and I may not be exactly connected in all the facts I shall submit, because there are so many of them—the importance of the question. We all know that some time ago we paid as high as 38 cents a gallon for gasoline. We know that the price of gasoline is and must be based upon the price of petroleum. The price of gasoline went down this year to something like 24 cents, but the reason why it went down was not because our supply of petroleum in the country was sufficient but because of the importations which were made. The report of the United States Geological Survey, in its review of the year 1922, on page 5, reads as follows:

The year 1922 in the crude-petroleum industry was characterized by record high production and by almost record imports, which resulted, in spite of record consumption and exports, in the already large accumulation of stocks being increased to the largest quantity ever recorded. These conditions of oversupply were reflected in unsettled and low prices of erade oil.

So they inform us that the price of gasoline went down during the year 1922 not because we have discovered new fields and are producing enough oil, but because we have imported more

I have here an article printed in the New York Times of February 6, 1923. I do not want to detain the Senate too long, so I shall not read the entire article, but I ask that it may be printed as an appendix to my remarks

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Appendix 1.)

Mr. BROUSSARD. I shall content myself by reading just a brief extract, as follows:

The increase in registered automobiles in the last nine years is shown to be 10.746,125 cars, or approximately 857 per cent. In the same period gasoline production increased 4.054,199,318 gallons, or 368 per cent, while crude-oil production increased only 221,257,250 barrels, or

Now, that is very significant. Automobiles have increased in five years 857 per cent, whereas the increase in the production of gasoline is only 368 per cent and the increase in the crude-oil production only 89 per cent. Shall we remain dormant here and ignore this problem or shall we do like the other civilized nations of the world are doing now and encourage the production of industrial alcohol as a motive power?

I have here, Mr. President, the statistics relative to the production of gasoline in this country. I asked the Department of the Interior to furnish me the statistics of that production for the last 20 years. They answered that they could not furnish the figures for every one of the 20 years, but that between the years 1899 and 1914 they could give the average for each of the years during that period. The average production between 1899 and 1904 was 281,000,000 gallons; from 1904 up to 1909 it was 291,000,000 gallons; between 1909 and 1914 it was 540,000,000 gallons. Then suddenly there was a jump, and we find that immediately after that the yearly production of gasoline went up to 1,500,000,000 gallons. Following that, we had, in 1918, a production of 1,825,360,137 gallons; in 1919 a production of 2,341,632,164 gallons. The production continued increasing until the year 1921, when it reached a total of 5,153,- 549.318 gallons.

Notwithstanding that production and the large oil imports, Mr. President, we imported gasoline during 1921 to the amount of 37,806,004 gallons. Those increases in production were made necessary by the increase in the number of automobiles and gasoline engines in this country. I ask unanimous consent that this line of figures be inserted in the Record as an appendix to my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Appendix 2.)

Mr. BROUSSARD. Alcohol in 1906 sold for 10 cents per gallon in Cuba; gasoline in 1914 sold for 8 cents per gallon. Think of the profits when 1 cent raise in price per gallon netted over $50,000,000. From 1906 to date gasoline advanced 16 cents per gallon. Last year the advance was at one time 30 cents. Let the farmers who made this Nation dry figure what the cost has been to them, what enormous fortunes made as a result of the unsurmountable difficulties placed in the manufacture of denatured or industrial alcohol.

Mr. President, I have here an article which appeared in the Newark Evening News of January 16, 1923, commenting upon the hearings which where held last month by a Senate committee which investigated, I think, the Standard Oil or some other oil company. I ask that the article may be printed as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCumber in the chair).

Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Appendix 3.)

Mr. BROUSSARD. I have here from the Department of Commerce, Bureau of the Census, for the year 1919, on the subject of "Petroleum refining," something which I desire to read to the Senate. Referring to Table 14, which I shall not insert because it is digested in these words, it proceeds to say:

The aggregate value of all products of the refineries in 1919 was an increase of 312 per cent over the total for 1914. In addition to the gasoline product of the refineries, there was a large production of casing-head gasoline, the output as reported by the Geological Survey for 1919 being 340,847,000 gallons, valued at $63,808,900, as compared with 42,652,632 gallons in 1914, valued at $3,105,900.

Mr. President, it will be noted that the increase so far as production is concerned does not correspond with the increase in price. That is because the enormous increase in the price of gasoline has been inevitable, as any human being could reasonably conclude if he considered the question for just one moment. We do know that we are very rapidly consuming the oil resources of this country. I have data and statistics which show, if I cared to bring them here-but that would make my speech too long if I followed out every branch of it-that although we are producing less than we consume, we ourselves are large exporters of petroleum oils and of gasoline, and that a large portion of our oil territory and oil production is controlled by foreign corporations, who are preserving their own petroleum and using ours. I do not think anybody would ever say that he expects the petroleum-oil production of this country to keep pace with the demands made upon such production for fuel and for motive power.

Mr. President, although some Senators were surprised when I referred to certain facts in connection with alcohol engines two years ago, I have since investigated the matter, and find that in 1907 the Congress of the United States, for the first time realizing the fact that our supply of petroleum in this country was limited and taking note of the rapidly increasing demand for gasoline for motive fuel and other purposes, and of the desirability of finding some substitute for gasoline, appointed a commission which went thoroughly into this matter. I have in my hand a report of the United States Department of Agriculture, Office of Experiment Stations, Bulletin No. 191, which is headed "Tests of internal-combustion engines on alco-hol fuel, by Charles Edward Lucke and S. M. Woodward." The report was issued on September 14, 1907, and I will read from page 88.

I read from it to show that alcohol was then demonstrated to be equally as valuable as gasoline:

CONCLUSIONS.

The following general conclusions are drawn as a result of the investigations reported in detail above:

(1) Any gasoline engine of the ordinary types can be run on alcohol fuel without any material change in the construction of the engine. The only difficulties likely to be encountered are in starting and in supplying a sufficient quantity of fuel, a quantity which must be considerably greater than the quantity of gasoline required.

That refers to the starting of the engine, in which process a larger quantity of alcohol is required than if the fuel is

(2) When an engine is run on alcohol, its operation is more noiseless than when run on gasoline, its maximum power is usually materially higher than it is on gasoline, and there is no danger of any injurious hammering with alcohol such as may occur with gasoline.

(3) For automobile air-cooled engines alcohol seems to be especially adapted as a fuel, since the temperature of the engine cylinder may rise much higher before autoignition takes place than is possible with gasoline fuel; and if autoignition of the alcohol fuel does occur no injurious hammering can result.

(4) The consumption of fuel in pounds per brake horsepower, whether the fuel is gasoline or alcohol, depends chiefly upon the horsepower at which the engine is being run and upon the setting of the fuel-supply valve. It is easily possible for the fuel consumption per horsepower hour to be increased to double the best value, either by running the engine on a load below its full power or by a poor setting of the fuel-supply valve.

(5) These investigations also showed that the fuel consumption was affected by the time of ignition, by the speed, and by the initial compression of the fuel charge. No tests were made to determine the maximum possible change in fuel consumption that could be produced by changing the time of ignition, but when near the best fuel consumption it was shown to be important to have an early ignition. So far as tested, the alcohol-fuel consumption was better at low than at high speeds. So far as investigated, increasing the initial compression from 70 to 125 pounds produced only a very silght improvement in the consumption of alcohol.

(6) It is probable that for any given engine the fuel consumption is also affected by the quantity and quality of lubricating oil, by the emperature of the fuel.

(7) If seems probable that all well-constructed engines of the same size will have approximately the same fuel consumption when working under the most advantageous conditions.

(8) With any good small stationary engine as small a fuel c

So you see, Mr. President, that its value as determined by the British standard is higher than that of gasoline; and this was in 1907, with scarcely any experiments to demonstrate that, and refers to experiments conducted in engines constructed for gasoline and not for alcohol.

This report proceeds:

But calculated on the basis of the low calorific values of 19,660 British thermal units per pound for gasoline and 10,620 for alcohol, the thermal efficiencies become 18.5 for the former fuel and 20.7 for alcohol. The ratio of the high calorific values used above is, gasoline to alcohol, 1.78. The corresponding ratio of the low calorific values is 1.85. The ratio of the consumption mentioned above is, alcohol to gasoline, 1.66 by weight, or 1.44 by volume.

You see, Mr. President, in 1907, when these experiments were made, the Congress of the United States was perfectly justified in 1906, for the first time in its history, industrial alcohol was put on a tax-free basis. In 1913 they reenacted this law, and they still kept industrial alcohol on a tax-free basis. When the Volstead law was enacted they still kept denatured alcohol on a tax-free basis; but by that time this country was committed to prohibition, and under the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution, which sought merely to regulate the production and use of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, the department proceeded to take away from the people the right freely to manufacture industrial or denatured alcohol, although it had been agreed that the best policy this country could adopt was to put it on a tax-free basis. What the Anti-Saloon League wanted to do was to prevent its manufacture altogether, and they have practically succeeded in that.

Mr. President, we have later reports from the Department of the Interior, the Bureau of Mines, in Bulletin 43. I have been investigating this subject for several months. To my surprise I have found, for instance, that Bulletin No. 43, issued in 1918, and likewise practically all of the bulletins issued on the subject of industrial alcohol, can no longer be obtained from the bureaus here. For some reason somebody has been interested in withdrawing them; and there is in almost all of these that I am using, and many at my office, the notation that they belong to the bureau or department office, or that they belong to the library, and I am pledged to return them.

Mr. President, in 1918 numerous experiments—I think about 1.000 of them-were conducted by the Government in Virginia and Missouri. I wish to read part of this introduction. whole of it is extremely interesting, and I should like to have permission to have it inserted in my remarks as an appendix to my speech.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Appendix 4.) Mr. BROUSSARD. I wish to read a part of the introduction and to make a statement as to the result of them. I read from the report made by R. M. Strong and Lauson Stone:

Under the terms of the act establishing the Bureau of Mines this bureau was authorized to carry on the work of testing and analyzing fuels, which had been conducted by the technologic branch of the United States Geological Survey. That work included in its scope an investigation of the availability and uses of liquid as well as solid fuels; for the original outline of the fuel-testing investigations contemplated, as soon as the funds would be available, a study of the liquid-fuel resources of the country and the making of related researches to determine how these resources could be utilized with greatest efficiency.

Owing to the fact that many difficulties were being encountered in to determine how these resources could be utilized with greatest efficiency.

Owing to the fact that many difficulties were being encountered in the adaptation of the heavier fuel oils for convenient use in internal-combustion engines, it was deemed best to begin the investigation of liquid fuels with tests of gasoline, a fuel in more or less general use.

When this investigation began, the extensive introduction, especially by foreign powers, of liquid fuels for small naval craft had awakened much interest. However, the quality of gasoline was reported to vary materially in different countries, and the quantity available was said to be rapidly decreasing, with the probability of a prohibitive increase in price. At the same time the claim was made that denatured alcohol of fairly uniform quality could be procured in all parts of the world; that unlimited quantities could be readily produced at a low cost; and that this fuel could be used much more efficiently than gasoline in internal-combustion engines. Such statements naturally led to a widespread belief that the time was near at hand when denatured alcohol would entirely displace gasoline as engine fuel. Therefore the first investigations of the liquid mineral fuels logically embraced a careful series of comparative tests of gasoline and denatured alcohol in engines. A series of over 2,000 such tests was conducted at the Government fuel-testing plants at St. Louis Mo., and Norfolk, Va., details of which are given in the following pages. The report is published by the Bureau of Mines because of the transfer of the fuel-testing investigations to this bureau.

stance they cover the following points:

First, they found-and these are comparisons between gasoline and industrial alcohol-that the heating values were the same. They found that in engines up to 15 horsepower the ratio of efficiency is as 180 is to 70 in favor of alcohol. They found further, in general—that is, in relation to all qualities of engines considered together-that alcohol was as good as gaso-They found further that in engines having a compression of 70 pounds alcohol has a horsepower of 10 per cent over gasoline. They found that for storage purposes the advantage was decidedly in favor of alcohol, both for cleanliness and because it is less inflammable, less likely to explode and start a fire. They say that industrial alcohol will eventually and must necessarily be cheaper than gasoline. They say that the insurance rate and the transportation charges on alcohol are in favor of alcohol.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I do. Mr. McCUMBER. I wish the Senator would inform us on what basis they make that prediction—that in the future gasoline will be more expensive, or that alcohol will be less expensive?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I shall be glad to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is this on the assumption that we shall soon exhaust our gasoline, and that its price, therefore, will be very much higher, or that the other product will be

Mr. BROUSSARD. I think the burden of my argument in its entirety will answer the Senator's question; but their conclusions are based on two reasons, both of which are suggested in the question.

First, we know that the production of alcohol depends upon the yearly production of crops, and that it can be increased at will, it can be increased in accordance with the demand, whereas the production of gasoline is dependent upon the production of petroleum; and already it is known that the petroleum is giving out, and that in this country we are rapidly approaching the point where we shall have absolutely consumed it all. Therefore the conclusion is that we shall eventually be driven to the use of alcohol.

I wish to make this observation at this particular point: What interests me in the proposition is that there is involved here the same question that was involved when the war came on as to the experiments in industry and chemistry; that, as I shall show later, England, Germany, France, Italy, and Cuba are all experimenting along this line, and Australia has given a bonus for the production of industrial alcohol; and that unless we wake up and follow them in that, they will obtain certain patent rights in this respect and we shall be handicapped for years to come,

Mr. McCUMBER. I noted the statement made by the Sena-tor a short time ago that denatured alcohol was worth 60 cents a gallon at the same time that the retail price of gaso-line is probably 22 to 24 cents a gallon; and I was wondering if the conclusion which he drew was that gasoline in a short time would go up as high as 60 cents a gallon, or that the development of the alcohol industry would bring the price of alcohol down nearer to the present par of gasoline?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am very glad the Senator has asked the question, because, I will say to him, that what I am trying to establish is the fact that because of the elimination of industrial alcohol as a competitor to gasoline and the further fact that we are consuming more gasoline than we produce in this country, there has been an increase in the price of gasoline. On the other hand, I am also trying to illustrate the fact that whereas the act of 1906 and the act of 1913 and the national prohibition act, every one of which avowed the purpose to encourage the development and production of domestic alcohol and the development of the industries and the sciences in this country, granted these rights to the farmer, the bureau having the enforcement of that law has by means of unreasonable regulations nullified all these laws; and to-day not only is the farmer unable to manufacture industrial or denatured alcohol under these permissive statutes but many of the large distilleries have been put out of business by regulations which are intended to put them out of business. I may further state to the Senator that, granted industrial alcohol is of equal value to gasoline as a substitute, the amount of industrial alcohol used in competition with gasoline as a motor fuel and for heat and light would to that extent reduce the price of the latter. It is simply a case of supply and demand.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield. Mr. STANLEY. I doubt not that the Senator will touch on the question in the course of his very learned and elaborate address, but any vegetable juice containing sugar or starch will produce alcohol. Stalks of corn, potatoes, any sugar, blackstrap molasses, and a thousand and one things grown on a farm can cheaply be converted into alcohol. the conversion into beverage alcohol but, as the Senator has said is provided by law, the making of industrial alcohol will be the greatest absorber of surplus farm products. For instance, one year potatoes will bring $1 a bushel, the next year they will bring 10 cents, and the next year they are allowed to rot on the ground because it does not pay to dig them. Every one of those potatoes could be utilized at a good price in the manufacture of industrial alcohol. The same is true of what farmers call "drowned" corn. The floods come up, and the stalks of the corn become soured, unfit for man or beast. That corn can be economically and advantageously converted into alcohol for industrial purposes. The law has never forinto alcohol for industrial purposes. The law has never forbidden it, but we are not governed by laws any more; we are governed by bureaus, and a bureaucracy has autocratically by the imposition of designedly vexations and impossible restrictions, practically destroyed this great industry.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Kentucky, but I intend to cover this whole subject very thorally in the senator of the senator from t oughly, and I think that if he will follow me he will find that I go into that. It is a vast subject. I have sought to bring together certain facts which I think will show what I am trying to point out.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, the thought have constantly had in mind as I have been listening to the address of the Senator was whether it was possible to manufacture alcohol at a price low enough to compete with gasoline, even admitting its superiority as a fuel for use in engines, as the Senator has described. The United States Industrial Alcothe Senator has described. The United States industrial Alcohol Co. has almost gone out of business so far as the manufacture of alcohol is concerned. They manufactured a product a few years ago which they called "Alco gas," which was very superior to the average gasoline used as a motive power. I have been informed that they had to cease producing it because the high cost of the material and the high cost of production were such that they were unable to compete with gasoline prices.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I may say to the Senator, as I said to the Senator from Kentucky, that I think I have every phase of the subject covered in this speech, and if there is anything the Senator would like to ask me, I will be glad to have him remain in the Senate and ask me after I get through; but I have that very subject covered.

have here a report from England as to what is being done there and others as to what is being done here, what the cost of the manufacture of industrial alcohol is, and what the cost of gasoline is. I think I will cover that pretty fully.

I do not think I finished with the conclusions of this Bulletin No. 43. It says that as far back as 1918 safety and cleanliness favored the alcohol engine.

Coming to the question which the Senator from North Dakota just asked me, I have here a report sent to me from Whitehall. London. It is a statement of the facts and conditions in England, and I wish to read this, because I think the Senator from North Dakota will be interested in it. It reads as follows land, and I wish to read this, because I think the Senator from North Dakota will be interested in it. It reads as follows:

The accurate ascertainment of the quantity of alcoholic spirits used for solely motor purposes has been a matter of some difficulty. Careful inquiries have been made and information sought from all available reliable sources, including the Alcohol Fuel Co. (Ltd.), Princes Street, Westiminster, S. W., and the Hammersmith Distillery Co., Distillery Lane, Fulham Road, Hammersmith (a branch of the Edinburgh Distilleries Co. (Ltd.)), probably the largest spirit distillery combine in the world.

All the information elicited tends to show that although the use of alcohol as a motor (i. e., general vehicular) propellant is as yet in the United Kingdom merely in its inciplent stage, nevertheless all the technical information received indicates that the motor use of alcohol is increasing in Great Britain by leaps and bounds, and that in all probability it will be the great mechanical propellant of the future.

The chief establishment at present occupied solely in the manufacture of this motor spirit is the Hammersmith Distillery Co. aforesaid, which has put on the market the well-known propellant "Discol," which is gaining favor in the commercial world.

The Alcohol Fuel Co., already mentioned, is only as yet preparing to launch its motor spirit on the market, but has large plants and factories about to begin manufacture at Hull and elsewhere. It is pointed out that alcohol when pure is a more rapid and efficient locomotive propellant than ordinary petrol, although in this form it will probably—at any rate, in the immediate future—not be very largely used for the purpose, owing to the fact that it would be liable to a duty of 75 shillings per gallon as immature spirit. Nevertheless even when denatured for motor purposes (by the addition of benzol, wood-naphtha dyes, and paraffin) its advocates still claim that it has material advantage over petrol as a transport agency.

On the point of definite, c

So it will be seen that it is about time for us to begin to consider this very serious question.

I have here a book which was printed by Doctor Farmer in Doctor Farmer was late principal assistant research chemist, Royal Arsenal, Woolwich; chief chemist of the explosives department of the ministry of munitions; member of the nitrogen products committee and of the chemical committee of the munitions inventions department.

I may say that I have come across so many authorities which date since 1907, when our first experiments were made here, that it would take a man years to read them. Experiments are being made all over the world, and everywhere except in the United States people are worrying about the disappearance of the probable supply of petroleum, and therefore gasoline. As I shall show in a moment, Australia is giving a bonus to the man who grows the raw product which goes into the manufac-ture of industrial alcohol, and gives a bonus to the man who manufactures the alcohol, in order to be sure that this power may be applied in its various activities of commerce and in-dustry and to the necessities of the nation, so as to bring about its development and its greatest efficiency,

I dislike to hold the Senate to read from books, but these comments are from authors of international reputation and, of course, I would not stop to set up my opinion against theirs and therefore I will read them. But I think many of the ques-tions of the Senator from Kentucky are answered here, although will read only the preface. Doctor Farmer's preface reads:

tions of the Senator from Kentucky are answered here, although I will read only the preface. Doctor Farmer's preface reads:

The association of alcohol with conviviality dates back to a very remote period. Its use for other purposes than as a beverage is a development of comparatively recent times, and the term "industrial alcohol" is even yet the subject of a good deal of misconception. The Government committee on the utilization of alcohol for power purposes (1919) indeed mentioned that some sections of the community believed that the words "industrial alcohol" referred to an inferior spirit for drinking purposes. One of the objects of this small work is to give an indication of the widespread chemical and industrial uses to which alcohol can be applied, including medicinal products, dyes, photographic materials, celluloid, and fine chemicals of all sorts.

Apart, however, from these manufactures, a new aspect of the subject has sprung up in recent years, which calls insistently for supplies of alcohol far in excess of anything that has been attained hitherto. The advent of the internal-combustion engine gave rise to a demand for enormous quantities of liquid fuel; the earth has been tapped for petroleum fuel with a prodigality which can not continue. The whole world's supply of petroleum is small when considered in comparison with the supply of coal. Already the demand is outstripping the supply, with consequent rise of price. The increasing home needs of America leave less and less for export, and we shall be faced in the near future by a serious check to the development of motor transport. In this book an attempt is made to show to what extent alcohol forms a suitable substitute for petrol, and to examine into the possible sources of alcohol, in order to ascertain the prospects of obtaining it in abundance, at a price which will compete with that of petrol. The destrability of drawing our supplies of motor fuel from recurrent vegetable sources instead of from the world's fixed capital of mineral wealth is ripe to say with certainty whether alcohol will form the main fuel of the future, but research in this direction is of the highest importance for the future of the internal-combustion motor.

I wish to insert without reading what Mr. Farmer calls the need for petrol substitute as set forth on pages 88 and 89 of this book, to be printed as an appendix to my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered

(See Appendix 5.)

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I think when our friends who like to help the farmer and when the farmers themselves begin to realize the great importance of this subject, we will have a somewhat different interpretation of the acts of Congress that will enable the people to manufacture one of the greatest needs of mankind at this time, which is denatured or industrial alcohol.

In 1917 a committee was appointed in Australia to investigate this subject. The report of the committee was dated De-cember 10, 1917. It was called a special committee to inquire into the production and utilization of power alcohol. From page 62 of their report I wish to read to the Senate the recommendations of the committee:

The committee recommends—

1. That in order to develop the use of alcohol for power purposes and to encourage the production of the raw material upon which the manufacture of power alcohol depends, the necessary action be taken to allow of the manufacture and use in Australia of "power alcohol," denatured with 2 per cent of either—

Then they give the denatured elements, which do not interest the Senate, and proceed:

2. That an allowance at the rate of 3d. per gallon be granted by the Commonwealth Government on "power alcohol" denatured in the above manner and manufactured in Australia from raw materials produced in Australia, by way of reimbursement of the extra cost caused by fiscal restrictions on the manufacture of alcohol.

3. That a bonus, also at the rate of 3d, per gallon, be granted by the Commonwealth Government on such "power alcohol" in order to encourage its manufacture and to develop the primary industries on which the supply of the necessary raw material depends.

I think that these questions are worthy of consideration by a Congress which has seen the eighteenth amendment so dis-torted through the enactment of laws as not only greatly to handicap the manufacture of this necessary product but absolutely forbids it to be manufactured except under the greatest difficulties only by large distilleries in the United States under most irritating and almost impossible regulations issued by the bureau.

Now, we know from the World War experience what was the effect of the absolute freedom accorded by the German Government to her citizens to manufacture industrial alcohol. I have here Bulletin 182 of the United States Department of Agricul-I wish to state again that it is most astonishing to me that these valuable papers and bulletins which have been collected to furnish information and data and to record experiments conducted at great expense to the Government are in many cases absolutely exhausted, although of recent date. The copies we may obtain are borrowed and must be returned. Here is one with a slip attached, "Borrowed from the library," and must be returned. None are to be had, although some of them are as recent as 1921.

Investigations were made by our Government in the year 1915 as to what the Germans were doing in the line of industrial alcohol. We find that as early as 1907 there were in Germany 5,595 stills, of which 4,701 were on the farms and only 1,261 in the cities. They demonstrated when the war came on the uses to which alcohol could be put. They had used it in all of their industrial activities. They had used it used it in all of their industrial activities. They had used it in their scientific research. They have used it in every line to accomplish results with which the world had to struggle for several years before they could be duplicated, even after we had during the war taken away from them the secrets of the manufacture of those products. After the year 1907 we find that Germany had 70,000 stills manufacturing not all potable alcohol but mostly denatured or industrial alcohol.

From what source did Germany derive this great supply of alcohol? It is stated in the bulletin to which I have just referred that Germany had 8,000,000 acres of land in potatoes, as compared with 1,250,000 in cereals. Potatoes were the chief source of the manufacture of the alcohol. I will say to my friends who belong to the agricultural group that the potato crop loss this year, I think, has exceeded the total production of many years in the past, but all of it an absolute waste. Germany grew potatoes as the chief supply for industrial alcohol, and yet here we have a department which would send a farmer to the penitentiary if he undertook under the acts of 1906 and 1918 and the national prohibition law, all of which give him the authority to make anything but liquor for beverage.

who manufactured even industrial alcohol, because he could not comply with the impossible regulations that are fastened upon its manufacture.

My Information is-and I am told that the Agricultural Department and the Commerce Department were concerned with it-that the loss in the potato crop this year was enormous. I do not know whether it is true or not, but I remember having read frequently that we burn corn whenever coal goes up in I wonder if we have burned any corn this year. shall show the quantity of corn consumed in the production of alcohol in the past and how all of it could be converted into industrial alcohol and all of it saved and made profitable to the country.

Mr. President, understand alcohol is an essential article. do not think I could state the proposition better than I stated it in my speech of June 28, 1921. I there commented upon the necessity of alcohol in the industrial activities and in the scientific research and development of the country. At this point in my speech I wish to insert a brief excerpt from that speech, without reading

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. President, chemists look upon alcohol as one of the most essential and important materials of their industry. They put it in the same class with sulphuric acid, benzol, or caustic soda. There can be no great development of chemical industry without alcohol any more than there could be a steel industry without pig iron, an electric industry without copper, or a fertilizer industry without popular or an analysis of the industries. He started the work which made possible the greatest development of all the ages. Germany grasped the significance and importance of applied chemistry and made marvelous progress.

The chief element in that development was alcohol, and now come narrow-minded, intolerant people who propose to the most intelligent legislative body in the world to intimidate, hinder, and harass American capital, brain, and industry under the pretext that occasionally some man, once a proud and free American citizen who toiled and was a real producer, deprived of his liberty and freedom, denied a glass of beer or wine in his home with his family, is driven to drink some cosmetic, hair tonic, or horse nostrum. To save the lives of those few for whose death they are responsible they would treat physicians and pharmacists as criminals, bootleggers, and rum runners and stop the industrial development of this Nation. While the eighteenth amendment was under consideration they called all the active antis "progermans." What should be said of them when their measures now favor foreign competitors?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I think my friend the Senator from

Mr. BROUSSARD. I think my friend the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCumber] made an inquiry awhile ago which may be considered answered by an extract which I shall read from "Information on Industrial Alcohol," by W. W. Skinner, Assistant Chief Bureau of Chemistry, dated December 8, 1922. On page 5 of his report, which I shall not read in its entirety, I find this unqualified statement

It is estimated that under present conditions (1922) the plantoperating cost of producing a gallon of alcohol from blackstrap cane molasses may be as low as 6 cents per gallon when the unit is operating at the highest efficiency and is producing from 30.000 to 100,000 gallons of alcohol per day. * * It is further estimated that the operating cost of producing alcohol from corn in manufacturing plants of similar capacity may be approximately 7 cents per gallon.

All of us have been trying to help the farmer. We find that England is actively encouraging the production of industrial alcohol to be used as a motor fuel. We find that Australia has given a bonus for its production. It is a fact that automobiles and engines are being operated in Cuba and throughout Europe with alcohol as a motive power. All of us are trying to pass laws that will increase the revenues of the poor farmer. But we have permitted a department in Washington to so construe the acts which permit him to manufacture industrial alcohol as practically to prohibit that manufacture. We find that the Bureau of Chemistry tells us we could manufacture alcohol in 1922 from blackstrap molasses at 6 cents a gallon and from corn at 7 cents a gallon. We have permitted the bureau to eliminate, as a competitor of gasoline, the industrial alcohol which is its only competitor. The result is that last year we which is its only competitor. The result is that last year we paid over 30 cents a gallon for gasoline and we are now paying 24 cents a gallon for gasoline.

Millions and millions of bushels of potatoes have rotted in the fields for lack of a market. There was no demand for them. The farmers have not been permitted to carry on what was a large industrial activity in Germany in the past-that is, to convert their potatoes into industrial alcohol which they could use in their own engines and in their own tractors on the farm. Oh, no; but we permit the Anti-Saloon League to assist in the elimination of the only competitor gasoline has and naturally the price of gasoline is increased, and the farmer in turn buys it at an advanced price, while his own product goes to waste on the farm.

All for what? What is the purpose? Just to enforce a sumptuary regulation, not justified by the eighteenth amendment, which does not refer to industrial alcohol. The eighteenth amendment does not refer to alcohol for any purpose except it be intoxicating and for beverage purposes, and spirits of that description are the only ones debarred under the eighteenth amendment.

I have here a table which I think is of interest to the farmers who are now paying 24 cents a gallon for gasoline to operate their tractors and automobiles. This statement shows the quantities of grain and other materials used for the production of distilled spirits from the year 1901 to the year 1922. I ask unanimous consent to insert the statement as an appendix to my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Appendix 6.)

Mr. BROUSSARD. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact, taking, for instance, the year 1907, that there were used in the manufacture of distilled spirits in 1907 4.440,315 bushels of malt, 21,452 bushels of wheat, 685 bushels of barley, 6,250,898 bushels of rye, 23,474,509 bushels of corn, 17,301 bushels of oats, 1,629 bushels of mill feed, as well as quantities of other materials, such as molasses, and so forth.

I wish merely to show, Mr. President, how the farmers have lost a portion of their market. They have absolutely been the ones who have been fooled on this proposition, because they have been made to sustain this propaganda; and now that they have put it over they have lost the market for all these cereals. For instance, I will take the year 1922. that year I find that there were used in the manufacture of distilled spirits 679.697 bushels of malt. There was no wheat used and no barley used. There were 84,876 bushels of rye and 8,093,065 bushels of corn used. That was all the cereals used in the manufacture of distilled spirits that year.

In other countries, such as Australia-and I think Australia is just as progressive as is this country—they are making steady headway in the manufacture of industrial alcohol. While we are telling the farmers that we will legislate for them, we are forcing them to keep their products in their barns or leave them in the ground because there is no market, and we are permitting bureaus to issue regulations to deny them the right to manufacture what the law permits them to manufacture. In that way we are absolutely punishing them by failing to require these departments to execute the law as was intended, or, if the law must be amended, by failing to so amend it as to be consistent with the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. President, on June 7, 1906, I consider that this country was delivered over to prohibition, because it seems to me that the minute it was recognized that alcohol would be a competitor of gasoline there was a rush to destroy it, not only on the part of those who were interested primarily in bringing prohibition onto the people of the United States but aided and abetted by those who saw in the movement some economic advantage that might accrue to them.

On that day the Congress enacted a law making alcohol unfit for beverage or medical purposes tax free. The effect of the law, if it had been allowed to work out, would have been to give the farmer out of his own resources his light and heat and motor fuel, alcohol which could be distilled from his spolled and unusable crops, from refuse of all kinds. From the latter alone it was estimated in 1907 that 100,000,000 gallons of alcohol could have been made yearly. In seasons of heavy crops and consequently low prices these farm products could be converted into alcohol and stored until a time when poorer crops insure a better price, thus insuring a balance wheel of agriculture and steadiness of prices.

However, the hand of death was effectively laid upon such use of surplus material of the farmers by regulation No. 30, issued on September 29, 1906, by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, three months before the law went into effect. No farmer has ever profited from free denatured alcohol he was to make from his own waste, because the regulations, embracing 152 sections, were so drastic and impossible of observance, except by rich corporations, that the law was to all intents and purposes a dead letter.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the regulations which have been printed under the regulation No. 61 to carry out the existing law. Although the statutes in the original form gave the right to the farmer to convert his waste products, his surplus products, into industrial alcohol, these regulations absolutely defeat the law and make it impossible for him to do so.

The question has been asked, Who framed these deadly regulations? Was it not the same forces that were at work to bring about the adoption of the eighteenth amendment and the adoption of the national prohibition law? Of course it was. If they intended to deprive the farmer of the use of this industrial alcohol, why did not they come squarely before the American people and propose such an amendment to the Constitution as would be subject to that interpretation? But the amendment merely says that one can not make intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes; and the act declared on its face that it was to encourage the manufacture and use of industrial alcohol

These regulations have prevented anyone on the farm converting his surplus products into industrial alcohol, and the regulations make the cost of such manufacture so high as to be at this time more than double that of gasoline, making the cost so prohibitive as to deprive the farmer of the use of what would otherwise be a very cheap fuel for the operations of his farm.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield.

Mr. KING. I have not heard the previous part of the Senator's speech, having been called from the Chamber. I should like to inquire what objection is there to the manufacture of industrial alcohol as indicated by the Senator's last observation?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I may say to the Senator that if the farmer is to get the benefit of such a system as prevails in other countries at this time, and which prevailed in Germany a long time ago, permitting the farmers to get together and by a cooperative plan manufacture their alcohol on the farm, the regulations in force in this country must be amended. That system can not prevail here under the regulations which have been issued, because a man must fill about 70 forms; must, instead of equipping himself with cisterns and tanks, which were provided for under the act of 1913, store the product in Government warehouses, and those warehouses must be bonded and must be maintained under such restrictions as it is impossible to carry out, so that it is out of the question for the farmer to use his waste products without incurring so much cost as to destroy the value of that which he desires to conserve. Furthermore, the regulations are changed from time to time, so that it is difficult to keep track of them. The Senator will readily understand that the people of the United States were led to believe what was the purpose of the national prohibition law. I will read the title of that act, which is:

An act to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries.

I will say to the Senator if that intention were carried out, all these regulations would be repealed and a sensible set of regulations issued which would not assume that every farmer is a bootlegger and a crook and a moonshiner but would assume that every man is an honest man; such regulations as would permit a man to convert his surplus and waste products for which there is no market into what the eighteenth amendment says he has a right to convert them into, what the act of 1906, the act of 1913, and the national prohibition act say he shall have a right to convert them into. If, however, the most in-telligent farmer the Senator might pick out tried to manufacture denatured or industrial alcohol either on his farm or that of his neighbor under a cooperative plan, he would not operate three weeks before he would be put in the penitentiary, because the regulations are impossible of fulfillment except by the distillers who are close to or control bonded warehouses and who may comply with the regulations. also. I will say to the Senator, are to-day being treated as bootleggers, as crooks, and the assumption of the enforcement department is that they are moonshiners and dishonest.

I will say to the Senator that when the amendment to the national prohibition act called the Campbell bill was brought up here it contained a provision that a distiller shipping industrial alcohol was responsible for the delivery of that alcohol, in this sense: If he had paid the tax on this alcohol-and of course the commissioner has the right to require him to pay the tax on it before it is removed from the warehouse-and if he shipped it, say, from New Orleans to Chicago, and somewhere in transit somebody wrecked the train and stole the alcohol, that proposed law said that the assumption was that the distiller was a conspirator in the robbery, and unless he demonstrated to the Government that he was no party to the theft he could not recover his money. That is the spirit that prevails in the execution of this law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me. I was interested only in this aspect of the case: I have received a number of letters from individuals who stated that the manufacture of industrial alcohol was drifting into the hands of monopolists—that is, into the hands of a few individuals—and that the manufacture of the product would soon be a monopoly, and prices would be inordinately high. I knew nothing about it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I will say to the Senator that I have just submitted to the Senate the fact that denatured alcohol now sells for about 60 cents a gallon, and I have here facts from the department showing that a gallon of alcohol can be manufactured from blackstrap mollasses for 6 cents, and it can be manufactured from corn for 7 cents. Why, as the Senator knows, before prohibition aged whisky could be bought from a bonded warehouse at 50 or 60 cents a gallon.

Then there is something in the complaint? Mr. KING.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Why, the farmer has been made the cat's-paw of the propagandists in this movement. The farmer has been absolutely denied the privilege which is granted him under the eighteenth amendment, which is granted him under the act of 1906, which is granted him under the act of 1913, and which is granted him under the national prohibition law, to manufacture this fuel, this motive power and greatest solvent ever known. By the way, I want to make this observa-tion, too: Before the days of national prohibition gasoline could be bought at 8 cents a gallon. Today, alcohol is going up and drifting into a centralized control, the farmer's potatoes remain in the ground, his corn is a loss, his waste products are a loss, and he is buying gasoline at 24 cents per gallon to operate machinery to produce this corn, and last year it was 30 to 38 cents per gallon, when he has on his farm the raw material for making alcohol, and under the Constitution he has a right to make industrial alcohol, and under the law he has a right to make industrial alcohol, which England, Australia, Cuba, and our own department say can be used more profitably than can gasoline itself.

I have here these figures on prices:

In 1907, the price of gasoline was 8 cents a gallon and the price of raw alcohol was 10 cents a gallon; and during that year, as you will see if you look at those figures, millions and millions of bushels of cereals were used profitably in the production of alcohol at 10 cents a gallon. To-day, as a result of these regulations, alcohol is worth 60 cents a gallon, and there is practically none of the corn being used for that purpose, not even for industrial purposes. That is something for the farmer to think about.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I do.

Mr. COUZENS. What is the price of alcohol in other countries where the manufacture of denatured alcohol is permitted? Mr. BROUSSARD. I would not assume to give the prices in all the countries. To what country does the Senator refer?
Mr. COUZENS. France, for example.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I do not know. I have no figures at all

Mr. COUZENS. What about England?

Mr. BROUSSARD. In England, I read into the RECORD a while ago the statement that there is a tax of 75 shillings per gallon; but they say that notwithstanding this tax they believe that after paying this tax it will very soon be profitable for them to use alcohol; but the Senator knows what it costs to make alcohol in Cuba, for instance.

Mr. COUZENS. As a matter of fact, the permission to make denatured alcohol really has not brought down the price of gasoline in any country as yet, has it?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Why, it is not being used extensively in other countries. Heretofore we have been exporters of gasoline, as the Senator knows.

Mr. BROUSSARD. England is now devoting some attention to the development of the alcohol engine, because of the fact that, unless other supplies are developed, our decreased exportations of gasoline will affect her price; and we shall soon reach the point where we can not export any more gasoline, because our exportation indirectly depends upon what we import from

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include as appendixes to my remarks articles from Chemical and Metalpendixes to my remarks articles from Chemical and Metal-lurgical Engineering, of November 29, 1922, and an article from the Newark Evening News, of January 16, 1923. The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. (See Appendix 6 and Appendix 7.) Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I assume that the reason why farmers are not being permitted on the cooperative plan to develop their own motive power is because the authorities are afraid of illicit distilleries. I was curious to know how many distilleries they have suppressed by denying to the farmer the right to manufacture his own fuel. I find from the annual reports of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that in the years 1918 and 1919-these were preprohibition days-the figures were as follows: In 1918 there were 3,487 seizures of illicit stills; in 1919 there were 6,989 seizures. Then, after that, came 1920, 1921, and 1922, which, of course, were during the prohibition period. In 1920 there were 51,416 seizures; in 1921 there were 95,933 seizures; and in 1922 there were 111,155 seizures.

It seems to me that instead of preventing illicit distilling. the policy pursued here has resulted in stimulating it; and, Mr. President, notwithstanding these numerous seizures, aggregating 111,155 in 1922, I did not happen to hear any com-plaint from anybody that there was in that year any decrease of supply of liquor. We can easily imagine, therefore, how many distilleries there must be in this country, and yet the farmer is absolutely denied the right to use his own product when he is clearly entitled under these laws to use it, and to manufacture his own fuel and motive power and to sell it to other people as a means of developing motive power simply because it is claimed that the farmers will become illicit distillers. If we will consult the records, however, we will find that this policy is absolutely increasing the number of illicit distilleries. It is not helping at all in the enforcement of the law. It is merely punishing the farmer, and he is the man who has put this law upon the statute books. It is about time for him to stop and think and see whether he has not been again made the cat's paw of some reformer. He is being made the goat, as suggested by my friend here, on this proposition. He voted this country dry. He reserved to himself under these laws the right to make industrial alcohol, and the propagandists who led the movement and who are now dictating the legislation wrote the regulations that will send him to the penitentiary if he follows these very laws. As a consequence, he is afraid to try to manufacture industrial alcohol; and although he can produce it on the farm for 8 or 9 cents a gallon-and it is equivalent to and better for most purposes than gasolinehe loses the material which would make good alcohol, and then he goes to market and buys gasoline at an extremely high price.

Mr. President, while I have these regulations, No. 61, I want to call attention to this fact: I looked at the back of the pamphlet and I remembered that the last time this subject was up in 1921 we discussed the feature of it that prevents a doctor from prescribing spirituous liquors, and so forth, and at that time I think they had five formulas for denatured alcohol. They now have 33 main divisions and some subdivisions, and they give here the formulas and the articles that they affect; in other words, the articles that can not be produced without denatured alcohol. They include pages and pages of things without which you can not furnish a house, without which you can not ride anywhere, without which you can not go to school, without which you can not go to church. The uses of alcohol are pro-hibited, although they are for industrial purposes, unless some deadly poison is included in the alcohol.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, if my colleague will yield at that point, I suggest that before he concludes his remarks he call the attention of the Senate to the fact, with which he is very familiar, that this refusal to allow the manufacture of industrial alcohol has not only cost the farmer untold millions. but by raising the price of industrial alcohol to 60 cents a gallon it increases the cost of living to that very farmer every time he buys a dose of medicine, or uses a tincture like arnica for a wound, or buys a tire for his automobile, or colored prints on his calico, or a thousand and one other things that are absolutely essential to his life and to the industrial life and comfort of every other citizen in his community.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Now, Mr. President, I want to conclude this address. I have this to say in conclusion:

The supply of petroleum is becoming exhausted very rapidly in this country, and the supply of petroleum in the world will soon be exhausted. All the progressive nations of the world are now trying to find some substitute for gasoline, and it is time for our people to realize that unless we get at this proposition and permit the manufacture of industrial alcohol at such a price that it may be profitably used in transportation or on the farm no progress will be made, and when the time comes when there is no more gasoline here we will be in the same position we were when war was declared. We went over to the Patent Office and seized all the patents Germany had, and it took us a couple of years to learn how to utilize them; and in many cases of articles of material necessity of a great nation we have not yet determined the practical technique with which to apply the information which we seized at the Patent Office. In other words, we got the information but we did not have the trained minds and the skilled hands to apply the information which we got there. While Australia recommends a bonus and the other nations are appointing commissions and encouraging the manufacture of industrial alcohol, if we persist in this foolish habit of prohibiting the manufacture of commodities on the assumption that a man is a criminal and a crook because he attempts to do something that will supposedly do violence to some sumptuary measure; if we persist in that attitude of mind, within the next 20 years, when the gasoline shall have given out, you will find that the advances made in the internal-combustible alcohol engines will have been made by foreigners, and that their rights will be safeguarded by patent rights. It may take us years and years to catch up with them. Those are things we ought to be wise enough to forsee, and they are things which we should have the courage

It seems to me that the attitude the people of the United States should take may be condensed in the words which I wrote this morning as I came to the Senate; and I venture to say that if any political party announced a set of principles of this kind, I do not care what party it is, it would sweep this country. I suggest this as a set of principles we should adopt: First. That all provisions of the Constitution and all laws must be equally enforced if their respect is to be safeguarded. Second. It is suicidal and treacherous to handicap the industrial and scientific development of this Nation by an interpre-tation of an amendment of the Constitution not warranted by the intent, the spirit, or the wording of the amendment.

Third. The greatest possible exercise of local self-government is the bedrock of the Constitution of this country.

Whenever we adopt these principles, Mr. President, I think we shall have adopt these principles. we shall have retrieved the wrong which has been done in the last few years under sumptuary measures which are denying everybody every day the right to do things which are not in violation of the Constitution and the laws of this country.

EIGHT BILLIONS INVESTED IN UNITED STATES OIL INDUSTRY—STANDARD GROUP, REPRESENTING 40 PER CENT OF TOTAL, DOMINATES THE BUSINESS—DUE TO PIPE LINE CONTROL—EXPANSION OF PETROLEUM INDUSTRY KEEPING PACE WITH DEVELOPMENT OF THE AUTOMOBILE.

The petroleum industry of the United States represents a capital investment of approximately $8,000,000,000, thus placing it high in the ranks of American business enterprises. Of this total, about 40 per cent is invested in the companies composing the Standard Oil group and 60 per cent is invested in the independent companies. Although the balance is in favor of the independents, figures have been presented at the investigation into the industry now being carried on at Washington showing that the Standard Oll group continues to hold the dominating This, it is stated, is because the Standard companies control the larger part of the pipe-line facilities.

It has been pointed out that with only 40 per cent of the total invested capital, the Standard companies refine 45 per cent of the crude oil produced and control 55 per cent of the domestic marketing facilities and 75 per cent of the foreign marketing business. It is further stated that while the Standard group controls only 25 per cent of the oil produced in the United States, this is counterbalanced by owning 60 per cent of the country's pipe-line capacity.

The position of the Standard Oil companies with relation to the many independent companies, as shown at the Senate investigation, is presented in the following tables, the figures being based upon the holdings of crude oil and petroleum products on June 1, 1922:

Regarding the $8,000,000,000 investment in the oil companies operating in the United States, it is pointed out that part of the investment in the Standard companies represents capital put into them for operations in foreign countries. The Standard Oil of New Jersey, the Standard Oil of New York, and Standard of California, either directly or through subsidi-Standard of California, either directly or through subsidiary companies, carry on extensive operations in foreign countries. The relation between the growth of the automobile industry of the United States and the expansion of the oil industry is summed up graphically in the following table, which is given in a booklet on the Standard Oil companies, just published by C. H. Pforzheimer & Co., specialists in Standard Oil securities:

The increase in registered automobiles in the last nine years is shown to be 10,746,125 cars, or approximately 857 per cent. In the same period gasoline production increased 4,054,199,318 gallons, or 368 per cent, while crude oil production increased only 221,257,256 barrels, or 89 per cent.

The booklet points out that the United States is steadily becoming more dependent upon the oil production of foreign countries to meet the demand at home. Figures are given in the following table to show that despite the increase in domestic production there has been a steady increase in imports from other countries:

	Consumption, domestic (barrels, 42 gallons).	Production, domestic (barrels, 42 gallons).	Imports.

"At the outset of 1923 domestic production of crude oil is temporarily in excess of domestic requirements," it is said, having reached a daily average in excess of 1,600,000 barrels. This is largely due to the development of prolific areas in California, where output is 125,000 barrels a day in excess of what it was at the outset of 1922. The light oil fields of the midcontinent, which gave a high record yield in 1922, are now showing signs of decline. In the last quarter of 1922 light oil in the midcontinent showed a decline for the first time in

"James E. O'Neill, president of the Prairie Oil & Gas Co. and J. C. Donnell, president of the Ohio Oil Co., declared recently that light oil production in this country has reached its peak and that we will have to draw on foreign fields to supplement domestic production.

"Much comment has been made over the fact that the industry enters 1923 with the largest inventories of raw material and refined products ever recorded. These are facts as regards volume, but these inventories are none too large in relation to expanded consumptive needs. For instance, in when gasoline reserves were at their peak, reserve gallonage per car was less than at any time in five years, with the exception of 1920. While reserve supply of While reserve supply of raw material has risen to 275,000,000 barrels, the greater proportion of this is heavy oil, which the mounting consumption of liquid fuels soon will take care of. The output of light grade crude oil actually appears to be falling behind the de-mand, which is reflected in the recent general price advances in the lighter grades of oil produced east of the Rocky MounAPPENDIX 2.

Hon, EDWIN S. BROUSSARD, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In response to your recent telephone request for figures showing the production of gasoline and naphtha for the past 20 years, I am inclosing mimeographed statistical tables showing the production of gasoline, which includes naphtha, for the years 1916 to 1921, inclusive. Considerable effort has been made to obtain reliable figures for the years prior to 1916, but the only data obtainable are the figures of the United States census of manufactures giving the production for every fifth year. These figures are given below

1899-1904-1909-1914-281, 000, 000 291, 000, 000 540, 000, 000 1, 500, 000, 000

The annual refinery statistical report compiled in this bureau showing the production of refined products of petroleum in the United States for the calendar year 1922 will be published in about a week. A copy of this report will be sent you as soon as it is available for distribution.

Cordially yours,

H. FOSTER BAIN, Director.

the Men Tell Probers Standard Makes Prices—Independents Review Conditions That Forced Smaller Firms to Wall—Suicides Laid to Market Drop.

Washington, January 16 (AP).—Details of battles waged in the oil fields of the Southwest between independent oil companles and corporations belonging to the Standard group were given at the Senate oil inquiry to-day prior to the appearance of Harry F. Sinclair, chairman of the Sinclair Consolidated Oil Corporation.

A. Wiley, of Wichita, Kans., secretary of the Broadview Oil Co., an independent, declared the increase in crude oil prices made by Standard companies in the midcontinent field in 1920 and early in 1921 and the later break in prices "looked to me as prearranged and an endeavor to get the independents in a corner."

P. A. Butler, jr., of Oklahoma City, vice president of the National Oil & Development Co., related negotiations between his concern and the Magnolia Petroleum Co., a Standard corpora-tion, which he said resulted in imposition on the National company of a contract under which the Magnolia company got the National's oil at virtually its own prices.

"The price was going down and the Prairie Pipe Line Co. (the other Standard company operating in the field concerned) refused to take our oil."

of such companies.

"Was there any justification for raising the prices of oil to $3 a barrel and then dropping it to $1?" the committee coun-

"No; it was not an honest response to supply and demand," replied Mr. Wiley.

COMPARATIVE FUEL VALUES OF GASOLINE AND DENATURED ALCOHOL IN INTERNAL-COMBUSTION ENGINES.

By R. M. STRONG and LAUSON STONE.

INTRODUCTION.

Under the terms of the act establishing the Bureau of Mines, this bureau was authorized to carry on the work of testing and analyzing fuels which had been conducted by the technologic branch of the United States Geological Survey. included in its scope an investigation of the availability and uses of liquid as well as solid fuels, for the original outline of the fuel-testing investigations contemplated, as soon as the funds would be available, a study of the liquid-fuel resources of the country and the making of related researches to determine how these resources could be utilized with greatest efficiency.

Owing to the fact that many difficulties were being encountered in the adaptation of the heavier fuel oils for convenient use in internal-combustion engines, it was deemed best to begin the investigation of liquid fuels with tests of gasoline, a fuel in more or less general use. When this investigation began, the extensive introduction, especially by foreign powers, of liquid fuels for small naval craft had awakened much interest. However, the quality of gasoline was reported to vary materially in different countries and the quantity available was said to be rapidly decreasing, with the probability of a prohibitive increase in price. At the same time the claim was made that denatured alcohol of fairly uniform quality could be procured in all parts of the world, that unlimited quantities could be readily produced at a low cost, and that this fuel could be used much more efficiently than gasoline in internal-combustion engines. Such statements naturally led to a widespread belief that the time was near at hand when denatured alcohol would entirely displace gasoline as engine fuel. Therefore, the first investigations of the liquid mineral fuels logically embraced a careful series of comparative tests of gasoline and denatured alcohol in engines. A series of over 2,000 such tests was conducted at the Government fueltesting plants at St. Louis, Mo., and Norfolk, Va., details of which are given in the following pages. The report is published by the Bureau of Mines because of the transfer of the fuel-testing investigations to this bureau.

PERSONNEL.

The investigation was conducted under the supervision of R. H. Fernald, then engineer in charge of the producer-gas section of the technologic branch of the United States Geological Survey. The tests were made by R. M. Strong, assistant engineer in charge of the oil-fuel section, assisted by J. C. Barnaby, W. A. Wicks, H. A. Talbott, W. B. Loye, E. W. Gallenkamp, P. G. Weidner, G. H. Hopkins, and other junior engineers who were temporarily transferred for these particular investigations. The computations were made under the direction of Lauson Stone, assisted by S. P. Howell. Mr. Stone also collaborated with Mr. Strong in the preparation of this report. The necessary chemical work was performed, under the general supervision of Prof. N. W. Lord, by the regular laboratory force of the technologic branch.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

The authors wish to express their thanks to Dr. Charles E. Lucke and Prof. S. M. Woodward for suggestions found in a report entitled "Tests of Internal-Combustion Engines on Alcohol Fuel," published by the Office of Experiment Stations, Department of Agriculture. The report was frequently consulted during the procedure of the investigations covered by this bulletin

PRELIMINARY REPORT ON DENATURED ALCOHOL AND GASOLINE,

In 1909 Strong presented in a small bulletin¹ the general characteristics of the engines used and a general description of the methods of procedure and the properties of the fuels. The commercial deductions set forth in that preliminary report are given herewith.

HEATING VALUE.

The low heating value of completely denatured alcohol averages 10,500 British thermal units per pound, or 71,900 British thermal units per gallon.

thermal units per gallon.

The low heating value of gasoline having a specific gravity of 0.71 to 0.73 averages 19,200 British thermal units per pound, or 115 800 British thermal units per gallon or 115,800 British thermal units per gallon.

The low heating value of 1 pound of alcohol is approximately six-tenths of the low heating value of 1 pound of gasoline.

One pound of gasoline requires approximately twice the weight of air for complete combustion that is required by 1 pound of alcohol.

The heating value of 1 cubic foot of an explosive mixture of alcohol vapor and air having theoretically just sufficient air for complete combustion is approximately equal to that of 1 cubic foot of a similar explosive mixture of gasoline vapor and air—about 80 British thermal units per cubic foot.

EXPLOSIVE MIXTURES.

Explosive mixtures of alcohol vapor and air in an engine cylinder can be compressed to much higher pressures without preigniting than explosive mixtures of gasoline vapor and air. The maximum compression that can be used in an engine without causing preignition depends on the quality of the explosive mixture, the design of the engine, and the speed at which it is operated.

For 10 to 15 horsepower four-cycle stationary engines of the usual type a pressure of about 70 pounds per square inch above atmospheric pressure was found to be the maximum that could be used for gasoline mixtures, and about 180 pounds the maximum that could be used for alcohol mixtures, without causing preignition.

The maximum compression that could be used without causing preignition was in each case found to be the most advantageous with regard to fuel economy.

MOST ECONOMICAL DEGREE OF COMPRESSION.

When the degree of compression in each engine is that best suited to the economical use of the fuel designated, some types of gasoline engines are better adapted to the service for which they are designed than similar alcohol engines, and vice versa. This is also true—the relative quantity of fuel consumed being disregarded—when the degree of compression is that ordinarily used for gasoline mixtures, as when denatured alcohol is used in gasoline engines. But, in general, the alcohol engine is or can be so designed and constructed as to be equal to the gasoline engine in adaptability to service.

A gasoline engine having a compression pressure of 70 pounds, but otherwise as well suited to the economical use of denatured alcohol as gasoline, will, when using alcohol, have an available horsepower about 10 per cent greater than when using gasoline.

When the fuels for which the respective engines are designed are used to the same advantage, the maximum available horse-power of an alcohol engine having a compression pressure of 180 pounds is about 30 per cent greater than that of a gasoline engine having a compression pressure of 70 pounds but of the same cylinder diameter, stroke, and speed.

When denatured alcohol is used in 10 to 15 horsepower fourcycle stationary engines having a compression pressure of approximately 180 pounds and the engines are operated at their maximum loads, the pressures during explosion or combustion reach 600 to 700 pounds. Stationary gasoline engines in which the compression pressure can be raised to 180 pounds are not usually built heavy enough to withstand such explosion pressures for any considerable length of time.

QUANTITY REQUIRED FOR ENGINE FUEL,

A gasoline engine working at the degree of compression ordinarily used for gasoline mixtures will, in general, require 50 per cent more denatured alcohol than gasoline per brake horse-power hour.

Gasoline and alcohol engines of similar construction, working at degrees of compression best suited to the fuel supplied, in general require equal volumes of gasoline and denatured alcohol respectively per brake horsepower hour.

Gasoline engines of the usual four-cycle stationary type ordinarily consume about 1 pint of gasoline per brake horse-power hour when operated at about rated load and with a reasonably favorable adjustment of the mixture quality and the time of ignition.

When carrying light loads or maximum loads gasoline and alcohol engines governed for constant speed require a greater quantity of fuel per brake horsepower hour than when carrying their rated loads, if rated at about 75 to 80 per cent of their maximum loads; but unless the mixture quality and time of ignition are adjusted to suit each change of load the rate of consumption per brake horsepower hour is in general least at the maximum load and increases with a decrease in load.

When any of the usual methods of governing are used to control the speed of gasoline or alcohol engines the rate of fuel consumption per brake horsepower hour is ordinarily about twice as great at one-third load as at maximum load. At the same time an excessive rate of consumption of gasoline or denatured alcohol at any given load, if only due to the incorrect adjustment of the mixture quality and the time of ignition, may reach approximately twice the minimum rate required before it is noticeable from outward indications.

THERMAL PEFICIENCY OF ENGINES

The thermal efficiency of alcohol and gasoline engines generally increases with the pressure to which the charge is compressed when ignited.

The maximum thermal efficiency of 10 to 15 horsepower fourcycle stationary engines of the usual type when operated with a minimum amount of throttling was found to increase with the compression pressure according to the formula $E=1-\left(\frac{14.7}{P}\right)^{1/2}$ for gasoline and the formula $E=1-\left(\frac{14.7}{P}\right)^{19}$ for alcohol, in which E represents the thermal efficiency based on the indicated horsepower and low heating value of the fuel, and P represents the indicated absolute pressure of the charge at the end of the compression stroke in pounds per square inch.

A high thermal efficiency and a rate of consumption of less than 1 pint per brake horsepower-hour, both for gasoline and denatured alcohol, can often be obtained when the degree of compression, the load, the quality of the explosive mixture, and the time of ignition are carefully adjusted. A fair representation of the best economy values obtained, taken from the results of tests on 10 to 15 horsepower Nash and Otto stationary engines, and the corresponding thermal efficiencies are given in the following table:

Results from tests made on 19 to 15 horsepower Nash and Otto stationary engines.

PROPER COMPRESSION IN ENGINES.

When, by means of a double carburetor, gasoline and alcohol are used simultaneously, in varying proportions from practically all gasoline to practically all alcohol, the most advantageous degree of compression varies from that found to be the best for gasoline mixtures to that found to be the best for alcohol mixtures.

Tests that were made with such an adjustment of compression indicate that the total amount of fuel (gallons of gasoline+gallons of denatured alcohol) required for any given load is practically constant for the entire range of proportions, from all gasoline to all denatured alcohol.

MIXTURES WITH WATER.

When water is sprayed into an explosive mixture of gasoline vapor and air as the mixture enters the cylinder, it may often be supplied with as much water as gasoline, by weight, without affecting the performance of the engine except as noted below:

(a) The capacity or maximum available horsepower of an engine decreases with an increase in the percentage, by weight, of water present in the explosive mixture of gasoline vapor and air.

(b) When used in an engine having a constant degree of compression, water in an explosive mixture of gasoline vapors and air in weights up to those of the gasoline does not change the quantity of gasoline required to carry a given load.

(c) The pressure to which an explosive mixture of gasoline vapor, water, and air can be compressed in an engine cylinder without preigniting increases with an increase in the percentage of water in the mixture, and can be raised to about 140 pounds when the weights of water and gasoline are equal.

(d) That the quantity of gasoline required is not affected by an increase in the compression pressure, when preignition is prevented only by the introduction of water as above stated, is indicated by the results of tests made on an engine having a compression pressure of 130 pounds. These tests are so few, however, that the results are not conclusive.

Denatured alcohol diluted with water in any proportion up to 50 per cent can be used in gasoline and alcohol engines, if the engines are properly equipped and adjusted.

In an engine having a constant degree of compression the quantity of pure alcohol required for any given load increases and the maximum available horsepower of the engine decreases with a diminution in the percentage of pure alcohol in the diluted alcohol supplied. The rate of increase in the quantity of pure alcohol required is such, however, that the use of 80 per cent instead of 90 per cent alcohol (denatured alcohol is about 90 per cent pure) has little effect on the performance of the engine.

When an engine is supplied with diluted alcohol, the compression pressure that can be used without causing preignition increases with an increase in the percentage of water, but no tests were made to determine the effect of increased compression pressure on the economy with which diluted denatured alcohol could be used.

STORAGE.

The relative hazard involved in the storage and handling of gasoline and denatured alcohol is of particular importance in considering their use as fuels for marine, factory, and other engines, where a general fire would be likely to result from the accidental burning of the fuel stored or carried for immediate supply, or where the forming of explosive or inflammable mixtures of the fuel vapors and air in the immediate vicinity would be hazardous.
